INTRODUCTION

INTRODUCTION

En 1954, préoccupés par les luttes internes dont la succession de Staline faisait l'enjeu, les dirigeants soviétiques renonçaient aux aspects les plus virulents de leur campagne anti-occidentale et poursuivaient leurs efforts pour trouver un terrain d'entente avec les États-Unis et leurs alliés de l'Extrême-Orient et de l'Europe. Dans la péninsule coréenne, l'armistice négocié l'année précédente tenait bon. En Europe, une Alliance de l'Atlantique Nord forte et confiante consolidait ses positions à la faveur d'une série de conférences tenues à Londres et à Paris pour définir les conditions du réarmement de l'Allemagne de l'Ouest. Robert Ford, de retour de Moscou au début du printemps de 1954, était rassuré par le cours des événements :

Il est possible de maintenir la paix ou du moins l'état de « guerre froide » qui, à notre époque, passe pour la paix. Cela ne veut pas nécessairement dire qu'une ou l'autre partie renonce à l'espoir de convertir le reste du monde à son mode de vie, mais qu'il devrait être possible d'éliminer la guerre comme moyen d'instaurer des changements (document 693).

Le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures, Lester B. Pearson, ne partageait pas le même enthousiasme au sujet des chances de paix. Le plus qu'on puisse dire de 1954, concluait-il en décembre, c'est que « les troubles les plus graves demeurent une éventualité plutôt qu'une réalité; nous avons, au moins temporairement, réussi à échapper aux menaces de détérioration¹ ». Ces divergences dans le bilan de 1954 que Ford et Pearson dressaient ne sont guère étonnantes, car la transition entre la première phase de la guerre froide, caractérisée par les crises, et un ordre mondial plus stable, quoique toujours dangereux, était au mieux incertaine, mélange d'éléments déroutants du passé et de l'avenir.

Ces thèmes monopolisent une grande partie du chapitre consacré à l'Organisation du Traité de l'Atlantique Nord (OTAN) et sont étroitement liés au réarmement de l'Allemagne et à la lutte pour s'emparer de l'avantage stratégique en Europe centrale (chapitre 3, parties 2, 3 et 4). Tout au long de l'année, l'Alliance a dû répliquer aux efforts déployés par les Soviétiques pour désamorcer les tensions en Europe par la neutralisation de l'Allemagne. Sous l'impulsion du secrétaire d'État américain John Foster Dulles, l'OTAN a réagi en cherchant avec ténacité à faire adhérer l'Allemagne de l'Ouest à l'Alliance. Comme la plupart de leurs collègues alliés, les responsables canadiens des politiques doutaient que Moscou tienne à parvenir à un règlement en Europe et étaient disposés à accepter la grande stratégie élaborée à Washington, Londres et Paris. Ottawa insistait néanmoins pour qu'on la consulte, et, dans l'optique canadienne, l'importance des discussions sur les ouvertures soviétiques et la communauté européenne de défense tient à la persistance des efforts de Pearson pour faire en sorte que l'OTAN devienne une tribune de consultations véritables entre les alliés.

La perspective de l'entrée de l'Allemagne de l'Ouest dans l'Alliance de l'Atlantique Nord provoquait l'indignation de Moscou. Aux Nations Unies, la délégation soviétique proposait à l'Assemblée générale trois initiatives de propagande anti-américaine qui ont fait retentir une note discordante à la fin de la neuvième session.

INTRODUCTION

In 1954, preoccupied with the internal struggle over Stalin's succession, Soviet leaders abandoned the more virulent aspects of their anti-Western campaign and continued their efforts to seek an accommodation with the United States and its allies in the Far East and in Europe. Along the Korean peninsula, the armistice negotiated the year before held fast. In Europe, a strong and confident North Atlantic alliance consolidated its position when the conditions for West Germany's rearmament were elaborated in a series of conferences in London and Paris. For Robert Ford, who returned from Moscow early in the spring of 1954, these were reassuring developments:

[P]eace, or at least a state of 'cold war', which passes for peace these days, can be maintained. This does not necessarily mean that either side abandons its hopes that eventually some or all of the rest of the world can be converted to its way of life. But it does mean that it should be possible to eliminate war as a means of bringing about changes (Document 693).

The Secretary of State for External Affairs, Lester B. Pearson, was not as sanguine about the prospects for peace. The most that could be said about 1954, he concluded in December, was "that the gravest disturbances ... remained potential rather than actual; threats of deterioration which were, at least temporarily, successfully averted."¹ That Ford and Pearson should differ in their assessments of 1954 is hardly surprising, for the transition from the first, crisis-filled phase of the Cold War to a more stable, yet still dangerous, world order, was at best uncertain, containing confusing elements of the past and the future.

These themes take up much of the chapter on the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), and are closely associated with German rearmament and the struggle for strategic advantage in central Europe (Chapter 3, Sections 2, 3 and 4). Throughout the year, the alliance was forced to reply to repeated Soviet efforts to defuse tension in Europe through the neutralization of Germany. Spurred on by the American Secretary of State, John Foster Dulles, NATO responded by tenaciously seeking to incorporate West Germany into the alliance. Like most of their allied colleagues, Canadian policy-makers were sceptical of Moscow's interest in reaching a European settlement and were prepared to accept the 'grand strategy' worked out in Washington, London and Paris. However, Ottawa insisted on being consulted, and from the Canadian perspective, the significance of the discussions on the Soviet overtures and the European Defence Community lay in Pearson's continuing efforts to turn NATO into a forum for genuine inter-allied consultation.

The prospective incorporation of West Germany into the North Atlantic alliance provoked a spasm of outrage in Moscow. At the United Nations, the Soviet delegation sponsored three anti-American propaganda items in the General Assembly, which ended its ninth session on a sour note as a result. Still, as the documents in this volume make clear, there was no obscuring the optimism that resulted from the United Nations' success in disarmament matters, a subject that absorbed two-thirds of the General Assembly's time. The unanimity with which the world organization agreed on resolutions to revive stalled disarmament talks (Documents 138 to 166)

Pourtant, comme les documents réunis dans le présent volume le montrent clairement, l'optimisme suscité par le succès des Nations Unies en matière de désarmement, question qui avait occupé les deux tiers du temps de l'Assemblée générale, restait inentamé. L'unanimité avec laquelle l'organisation mondiale avait adopté des résolutions en vue de relancer les pourparlers sur le désarmement (documents 138 à 166) et d'étudier la possibilité de mettre sur pied une organisation internationale de l'énergie atomique (documents 167 à 207) a répandu « plus d'harmonie et de lumière... que jamais depuis la première Assemblée générale, à Londres, il y a neuf ans » (document 210). Pearson étant retenu en Europe auprès de l'OTAN, Paul Martin, ministre de la Santé et du Bien-être social et vice-président de la délégation canadienne à l'Assemblée générale, s'est affirmé comme principal porte-parole du Canada à l'ONU. À titre de négociateur principal des puissances occidentales avec l'Union soviétique au sujet de la résolution sur le désarmement, Martin a vu largement récompensée sa persévérance dans la recherche d'un compromis — ce qui était son plus grand talent de diplomate. Néanmoins, cette attitude a suscité des inquiétudes à Ottawa, au point que Pearson a lancé une mise en garde à son collègue : « Il ne faut pas pousser cet effort si loin que nous risquions de susciter des difficultés dans nos relations avec les États-Unis. » (Document 163)

Le premier ministre, Louis Saint-Laurent, s'est également lancé dans le circuit diplomatique en 1954, faisant une longue tournée mondiale pendant les premiers mois de l'année pour rencontrer ses homologues en Europe et en Asie. Cette tournée a été mal documentée et il en reste peu de témoignages, hormis les documents qui relatent les rencontres de Saint-Laurent avec le premier ministre de l'Inde, Jawaharlal Nehru. Ces documents qui ont survécu donnent cependant au lecteur une idée des difficultés auxquelles se heurtaient Saint-Laurent et Pearson, le Canada essayant de surmonter des dissensions de plus en plus marquées entre New Delhi et Washington au sujet des affaires asiatiques (documents 435 à 442). Les mêmes tendances s'observent dans les documents qui portent sur l'aide militaire accordée au Pakistan par les États-Unis (documents 431 à 434). De façon plus générale, la volonté du Canada de préserver la stabilité économique et politique de l'Asie comme rempart contre l'expansion communiste en Extrême-Orient se lit dans la trame de la longue série de documents sur le Plan Colombo (documents 390 à 430).

L'Asie occupait une grande place dans les relations extérieures du Canada en 1954. À leur réunion tenue à Berlin en février, les ministres des Affaires étrangères de la France, de la Grande-Bretagne, des États-Unis et de l'Union soviétique ont convenu de convoquer une conférence à Genève afin de trouver une solution au problème coréen. Tous les combattants, y compris la République populaire de Chine, la Corée du Nord et la Corée du Sud y ont été invités, et tous y ont participé à l'exception de l'Afrique du Sud. L'atmosphère était tendue. Un délégué canadien évoquait plus tard ses souvenirs en ces termes : « Au printemps et au début de l'été de cette année-là, Genève était un endroit extraordinaire... au centre de l'attention du monde entier². » Mais la conférence n'a pas tardé à s'enliser dans une impasse au sujet des modalités de surveillance des élections en Corée du Nord et en Corée and to explore the possibility of an international atomic energy agency (Documents 167 to 207) resulted in "more sweetness and light ... than at any time since the first General Assembly met in London nine years ago." (Document 210) With Pearson tied up in Europe with NATO, Paul Martin, the Minister of Health and Welfare and vice-chairman of the Canadian delegation to the General Assembly, emerged as Canada's foremost spokesman at the United Nations. As the principal negotiator for the Western powers with the Soviet Union on the disarmament resolution, Martin's persistence in search of compromise — his greatest strength as a diplomat — was well rewarded. Nevertheless, it prompted concern in Ottawa and caused Pearson to warn his colleague that "I do not think that the effort should be continued to a point where it would cause trouble between us and the United States." (Document 163)

The Prime Minister, Louis St. Laurent, also ventured onto the diplomatic circuit in 1954, undertaking an extended world tour during the first few months of the year to meet his counterparts in Europe and Asia. The visit was poorly documented and few records, apart from those chronicling St. Laurent's meetings with the Indian prime minister, Jawaharlal Nehru, survive. These, however, offer the reader a hint of the difficulties that faced St. Laurent and Pearson as Canada tried to bridge the growing divisions between New Delhi and Washington over Asian affairs (Documents 435 to 442). Similar impulses are reflected in the documentation on American military aid to Pakistan (Documents 431 to 434). More generally, Canada's desire to maintain the economic and political stability of Asia as a bulwark against Communist expansion in the Far East underpins the lengthy series of documents on the Colombo Plan (Documents 390 to 430).

Asia bulked large in Canada's external relations in 1954. At their Berlin meeting in February, the foreign ministers of France, Great Britain, the United States and the Soviet Union agreed to convene a conference in Geneva to find a solution to the Korean problem. All of the combatants, including the People's Republic of China, North Korea and South Korea, were invited, and all but South Africa agreed to attend. The atmosphere was electric. A Canadian delegate later recalled that "Geneva in that spring and early summer was an extraordinary place ... the centre of attention of the whole world."² The conference, however, was quickly deadlocked over how best to supervise the elections in North and South Korea, which all agreed were a necessary prelude to unification. In drafting a declaration to explain their decision to break off the talks, the sixteen-member United Nations coalition was torn apart by Washington's determination to yield no ground even at the cost of losing the battle, increasingly important in the Cold War context, for world opinion. Pearson and the Canadian delegation fought to maintain the coalition's unity (Documents 19 to 87). The stalemate in Geneva and the armistice in Korea, though hardly a satisfactory ending to an experiment in collective security that cost Canada 1,642 casualties, at least allowed Ottawa to begin withdrawing its troops from Asia (Documents 88 to 91).

du Sud, ce qui, tous en convenaient, était une condition indispensable à l'unification. Obligée de rédiger une déclaration expliquant sa décision d'interrompre les pourparlers, la coalition de 16 membres des Nations Unies était déchirée à cause de la détermination de Washington de ne pas céder de terrain, quitte à perdre la bataille, car cela était de plus en plus important aux yeux de l'opinion mondiale dans le contexte de la Guerre froide. Pearson et la délégation canadienne s'efforçaient de maintenir l'unité de la coalition (documents 19 à 87). L'impasse de Genève et l'armistice de Corée étaient loin d'être une issue satisfaisante à des efforts de sécurité collective qui avaient coûté la vie à 1 642 Canadiens, mais elles permettaient au moins à Ottawa de retirer ses troupes d'Asie (documents 88 à 91).

Les entretiens de Genève ont eu une autre conséquence importante pour la politique étrangère du Canada. Au cours des premiers mois de l'année, l'insurrection des communistes contre la France au Cambodge, au Laos et au Vietnam remportait une série de victoires dont le point culminant fut le siège des troupes françaises à Dien Bien Phu. Le Canada voyait avec inquiétude Paris perdre le moral, tandis que Washington essayait de galvaniser la détermination des Français par des promesses d'une « intervention concertée » (documents 714 à 722). L'échec américain a mené à la deuxième conférence de Genève sur l'Indochine, où la France, la Grande-Bretagne et la République populaire de Chine ont trouvé le moyen de mettre un terme aux combats. À la grande surprise d'Ottawa, le Canada s'est soudain retrouvé, avec la Pologne et l'Inde, membre du groupe international mis sur pied pour surveiller le cessez-le-feu (Chapitre 7, partie 1). En un an, 160 militaires et diplomates canadiens ont été affectés aux quatre coins du sud-est de l'Asie³. La participation canadienne aux trois commissions — une pour le Laos, une pour le Cambodge et l'autre pour le Vietnam — devait avoir un profond retentissement sur la politique étrangère du Canada au cours des deux décennies suivantes. Le présent volume propose une riche sélection de documents qui font la chronique des premières expériences du ministère dans cette partie de l'Asie.

Si la stabilité semblait mieux assurée et les tensions moins vives en Asie, en Europe centrale et aux Nations Unies, la terrifiante menace d'une guerre thermonucléaire, déclenchée accidentellement ou de propos délibéré, subsistait. Pearson fut consterné lorsque Dulles annonça en janvier que les États-Unis auraient recours, pour assurer leur défense, à une « puissance de représailles massive mise en action instantanément par des moyens et à des endroits que nous serons seuls à choisir⁴ ». Pearson réfuta le point de vue de Dulles dans une allocution prononcée au National Press Club, à Washington, lui rappelant que « le "nous" en question devait désigner ceux qui avaient convenu, notamment dans le cadre de l'OTAN, de collaborer et d'agir de concert pour prévenir la guerre et, si la guerre ne pouvait être évitée, pour remporter la victoire⁵ ». Le raisonnement sous-jacent aux déclarations publiques de Pearson sur cette question est documenté en partie dans le présent volume (documents 443 à 445).

The gathering in Geneva had another important consequence for Canadian foreign policy. During the first few months of the year, the Communist-led insurgency against France in Cambodia, Laos and Vietnam enjoyed a string of victories, culminating in the siege of French troops at Dien Bien Phu. Canada watched with concern as morale collapsed in Paris, and Washington tried to stiffen French resolve with promises of “united action” (Documents 714 to 722). The American failure led to a second Geneva conference on Indochina where France, Great Britain, and the People’s Republic of China engineered an end to the fighting. To Ottawa’s surprise, Canada suddenly found itself, with Poland and India, part of the international supervisory machinery established to oversee the cease-fire (Chapter 7, Section 1). Within a year, 160 Canadian military and diplomatic personnel were scattered on duty throughout Southeast Asia.³ Canada’s participation on the three commissions — one each for Laos, Cambodia and Vietnam — would have profound implications for Canada’s foreign policy over the next two decades. This volume includes a generous selection of material chronicling the department’s first experiences in this part of Asia.

Despite signs of increased stability and decreased tension in Asia, in central Europe and at the United Nations, the terrifying possibility of thermonuclear war — by accident or by design — remained. Pearson was dismayed by Dulles’s announcement in January that the United States would rely for its defence on “massive retaliatory power” applied “instantly, by means and at places of our own choosing.”⁴ Pearson rebuked Dulles in a speech to the National Press Club in Washington, reminding him “that the ‘our’ in this statement should mean those who have agreed, particularly in NATO, to work together and by collective action to prevent war or, if that should fail, to win it.”⁵ Some of the rationale behind Pearson’s public statements on this issue is documented in this volume (Documents 443 to 445).

Pearson and the Minister of National Defence, Brooke Claxton, were also distressed to discover that NATO’s military planners had based their latest strategic considerations on the assumption that theatre commanders would have automatic recourse to nuclear weapons in the event of war (Documents 356 to 380). Their fear that Canada might be drawn into a nuclear confrontation without forewarning or prior discussion was not entirely misplaced. Late in the year, nuclear war ominously loomed when the People’s Republic of China and the United States squared off over a handful of small islands in the Straits of Formosa. This crisis, which reached its climax in 1955, will be covered in Volume 21.

The increasingly public nature of nuclear diplomacy in 1954 had an unsettling impact on opinion in Canada and, more important, the United States. Public and Congressional pressure in the United States encouraged officials in both countries

Pearson et le ministre de la Défense nationale, Brooke Claxton, ont été également consternés d'apprendre que les planificateurs militaires de l'OTAN avaient fait reposer leurs plus récentes considérations stratégiques sur l'hypothèse selon laquelle les commandants sur le théâtre des opérations auraient automatiquement recouru à des armes nucléaires en cas de guerre (documents 356 à 380). La crainte que le Canada ne soit entraîné dans un affrontement nucléaire sans avertissement ni discussion préalable n'était pas entièrement dénuée de fondement. Vers la fin de l'année, la guerre nucléaire devenait une lourde menace, la République populaire de Chine et les États-Unis s'affrontant au sujet d'une poignée de petites îles dans le détroit de Formose. Cette crise, qui a culminé en 1955, sera traitée dans le volume 21. Le caractère de plus en plus public de la diplomatie nucléaire, en 1954, a eu un effet déstabilisateur sur l'opinion canadienne et, plus important encore, sur l'opinion américaine. Les pressions du Congrès et de l'opinion américaine ont incité les dirigeants des deux pays à intensifier leurs efforts en vue d'accroître les installations de défense du continent pour contrer la menace soviétique appréhendée (documents 448 à 462). Même dans ces conditions, il a fallu près d'un an à Ottawa pour accéder à une requête des États-Unis qui voulaient établir dans l'Arctique un réseau d'alerte avancé (documents 446 à 490). Dès cette époque, les responsables de la politique des ministères de la Défense nationale et des Affaires extérieures commençaient à envisager la probabilité que les États-Unis finissent par souhaiter l'établissement d'un commandement conjoint des forces canadiennes et américaines affectées à la défense de l'Amérique du Nord (documents 469, 476, 478 et 486). L'approche de ces deux questions (et même des autres questions de défense auxquelles est consacrée la première moitié du chapitre sur les relations avec les États-Unis) à Ottawa se caractérisait par la volonté de collaborer et le souci de préserver la souveraineté du Canada.

Les relations canado-américaines se distinguaient par la multitude des questions de ressources naturelles et de commerce qui découlent normalement d'un étroit partenariat continental. Le Congrès américain a finalement donné son accord pour l'aménagement de la voie maritime du Saint-Laurent, même si cet accord était assorti de conditions qui ont nécessité de longues négociations avec Ottawa avant que la construction ne puisse débuter (documents 559 à 580). Et même alors, la réalisation du projet a été entravée par les incertitudes techniques et les querelles mesquines (documents 581 à 588).

Des problèmes analogues surgissaient ailleurs en Amérique du Nord. Ainsi, les responsables canadiens de la politique s'inquiétaient des efforts du Congrès visant à accroître le volume d'eau prélevé dans le lac Michigan à Chicago et dérivé vers le sud (documents 612 à 621). Plus à l'ouest, les deux pays commençaient à se préoccuper sérieusement des conséquences à long terme de la mise en valeur de la Columbia (documents 600 à 608). Au même moment, le ministère du Commerce constatait avec un certain malaise que les États-Unis imposaient des restrictions à la vente du gaz naturel canadien sur leur marché (documents 589 à 595). Tout cela semblait avoir une signification claire : « L'un des plus importants problèmes de politique qui attirent maintenant l'attention... est celui des conditions auxquelles to accelerate their efforts to expand continental defence facilities to meet the anticipated Soviet threat (Documents 448 to 462). Even so, it took most of the year for Ottawa to agree to an American request for a distant early warning line stretching across the arctic (Documents 446 to 490). By then, policy-makers in the Departments of National Defence and External Affairs were beginning to confront the probability that the United States would eventually wish to establish some form of joint command over Canadian and American forces assigned to the defence of North America (Documents 469, 476, 478 and 486). In dealing with these two questions (and indeed, with the other defence issues that make up the first half of the chapter on relations with the United States), Ottawa's perspective was characterized by both a willingness to cooperate and a careful regard for Canadian sovereignty.

Canadian-American relations were distinguished by the host of natural resource and trade questions that arise normally from the close continental partnership. At long last, the United States Congress signalled its willingness to move ahead with the St. Lawrence Seaway, albeit with a set of conditions that required lengthy negotiations with Ottawa before construction could begin (Documents 559 to 580). Even then, the project remained beset by technical uncertainty and petty bickering (Documents 581 to 588).

Similar problems occurred elsewhere in North America. Canadian policy-makers, for instance, were alarmed by Congress's efforts to increase the volume of water diverted southward from Lake Michigan at Chicago (Documents 612 to 621). Further west, the two countries began to wrestle seriously with the long-term implications of developing the Columbia River (Documents 600 to 608). At the same time, the Department of Trade and Commerce watched uneasily as Canadian natural gas found its access to the American market restricted (Documents 589 to 595). What all this meant seemed clear: "One of the most important policy problems now coming into focus ... is concerned with the terms and conditions under which certain Canadian exports of energy — natural gas and water power — may be exported to the United States."⁶

More traditional trade irritants were also present in 1954. The problems created for Canadian wheat and cheese exports by new legislation in the United States aimed at reducing that country's agricultural surplus (Documents 513 to 522) figured prominently in the first meeting of the cabinet-level Joint Canada-United States Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs (Documents 523 to 558). So too did the future of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT), and the growing number of restrictions a protectionist Congress placed on imports to the United States.

The future of GATT, American protectionism and Europe's progress toward convertibility were the interrelated subjects of a protracted international discussion on trade liberalization. It unfolded in Sydney, where the Commonwealth finance ministers met in January (Document 385), and in Washington, where the Canada-United States Joint Committee gathered in March (Document 525). From there, it certain produits énergétiques — le gaz naturel et l'hydroélectricité — peuvent être exportés aux États-Unis⁶. »

D'autres points de friction plus traditionnels dans le commerce étaient également présents en 1954. Les problèmes qu'ont occasionnés pour l'exportation de blé et de fromage du Canada de nouvelles mesures législatives américaines visant à réduire les excédents agricoles des États-Unis (documents 513 à 522) figuraient en bonne place à la première réunion au niveau du Cabinet du comité mixte canado-américain des questions économiques et commerciales (documents 523 à 558). Se trouvaient aussi au premier plan l'Accord général sur les tarifs douaniers et le commerce (GATT) et le nombre croissant de restrictions imposées par un Congrès protectionniste sur les importations aux États-Unis.

L'avenir du GATT, le protectionnisme américain et la progression de l'Europe vers la convertibilité ont été les trois sujets, imbriqués entre eux, d'entretiens internationaux prolongés sur la libéralisation du commerce. Les entretiens ont eu lieu à Sydney, où les ministres des Finances du Commonwealth se sont réunis en janvier (document 385) et à Washington, où le comité canado-américain s'est réuni en mars (document 525). Ils se sont poursuivis ensuite à Paris et à l'Organisation européenne de coopération économique (documents 622 à 641) puis de nouveau à Washington, où les représentants du Commonwealth et des États-Unis se sont réunis pour confronter leurs vues et élaborer une stratégie (documents 227, 230 et 231). Le processus des consultations et des négociations a culminé à Genève vers la fin de l'année, au moment où les parties au GATT se sont rencontrées pour passer en revue et renforcer l'accord international (documents 218 à 235).

Les relations personnelles, politiques et bureaucratiques qui avaient modelé la politique canadienne en 1953 ont profondément changé en 1954. Saint-Laurent, épuisé par sa tournée mondiale, cédait de plus en plus à Pearson la conduite de la politique extérieure. En juillet, un remaniement ministériel faisait entrer au Cabinet de nouveaux ministres chargés de deux portefeuilles ayant des incidences importantes sur la politique étrangère. Après sa longue lutte pour gérer la contribution canadienne aux efforts de l'ONU en Corée, Claxton cédait son poste de ministre de la Défense nationale à Ralph Campney. Walter Harris, qui ne prisait pas « les activités sociales incessantes » liées à ses nouvelles responsabilités internationales remplaçait Douglas Abbott au poste de ministre des Finances (document 387). L'omniprésent C.D. Howe conservait le ministère du Commerce et celui de la Production de défense.

Pendant la majeure partie de l'année, un certain flottement a subsisté dans les responsabilités aux plus hauts échelons du ministère des Affaires extérieures. Pour combler le vide laissé par le décès soudain de Hume Wrong, en décembre 1953, seulement deux semaines après son accession au poste de sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures, Pearson nommait R.A. MacKay sous-secrétaire suppléant en janvier 1954. Chef du ministère pendant presque toute l'année, MacKay pouvait compter sur l'aide de trois nouveaux sous-secrétaires adjoints, John Holmes, Jean A. Chapdelaine et Max H. Wershof, ce dernier étant également conseiller juridique.

moved to Paris and the Organization for European Economic Cooperation (Documents 622 to 641) and then back to Washington, where Commonwealth and American officials met to compare notes and plot strategy (Documents 227, 230 and 231). The process of consultation and negotiation culminated in Geneva late in the year when GATT's contracting parties met to review and strengthen the international agreement (Documents 218 to 235).

The personal, political and bureaucratic relationships that had shaped Canadian policy in 1953 changed dramatically in 1954. St. Laurent, exhausted from his world tour, left more and more of the conduct of external policy to Pearson. A cabinet shuffle in July brought new ministers into two portfolios with important foreign policy implications. After his long struggle to manage Canada's contribution to the UN effort in Korea, Claxton was succeeded by Ralph Campney as Minister of National Defence. Walter Harris, who disliked the "continuous social activity" associated with his new international responsibilities, replaced Douglas Abbott as Minister of Finance (Document 387). The ubiquitous C.D. Howe remained Minister of Trade and Commerce and Minister of Defence Production.

For most of the year, responsibilities within the senior ranks of the Department of External Affairs remained unsettled. To compensate for the vacancy left by Hume Wrong, who died suddenly in December 1953 after only two weeks as Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, Pearson appointed R.A. MacKay Deputy Under-Secretary in January 1954. The effective head of the department for most of the year, MacKay was aided by three new Assistant Under-Secretaries: John Holmes, Jean A. Chapdelaine and Max H. Wershof, who also served as legal advisor. In April, MacKay was named Associate Under-Secretary and Jules Léger, the Ambassador to Mexico, was recalled to become Pearson's deputy. He took up his duties in mid-August. In selecting the 41-year old Léger, Pearson was anxious to "have a young and vigorous Under-Secretary, the first from Quebec, and one who would normally be in the job for a long time, content, I take it, with the prospect of being a 'permanent' Under-Secretary and not a bird of passage to an Embassy!"⁷

There were no changes in leadership at Canada's most important posts. David M. Johnson continued as Permanent Representative to the United Nations and Dana Wilgress remained Permanent Representative to the North Atlantic Council and Representative to the Organization for European Economic Cooperation. N.A. Robertson served as High Commissioner to the United Kingdom. Georges Vanier and Arnold Heeney remained ambassadors in Paris and in Washington, respectively. Tragically, Jack Thurrott became the first Canadian Foreign Service Officer to die on duty when his jeep hit a mine while on a patrol for the International Commission for Supervision and Control in Indochina.

The records of the Department of External Affairs and the Privy Council Office provided most of the material for this look at Canadian foreign policy. These sources were supplemented where necessary by the personal papers of many of the Cabinet ministers and senior officials involved in these events and by the records of ⁷ Quoted in John Hilliker and Donald Barry, Canada's Department of External Affairs, II: Coming of Age, 1946-1968 (Montreal and Kingston, 1995), p. 90.

En avril, MacKay était nommé sous-secrétaire associé et Jules Léger, ambassadeur au Mexique, était rappelé pour devenir sous-secrétaire de Pearson. Le nouveau sous-secrétaire a assumé ses fonctions à la mi-août. En choisissant Léger, âgé de 41 ans, Pearson cherchait à nommer « un sous-secrétaire jeune et vigoureux, le premier originaire du Québec, qui normalement occuperait le poste pendant un long moment, et qui serait heureux, je suppose, à la perspective d'être un sous-secrétaire " permanent " plutôt qu'en transit, dans l'attente d'une nouvelle affectation⁷! »

Il n'y a eu aucune modification aux postes de commande les plus importants du Canada. David M. Johnson demeurait représentant permanent auprès de l'ONU et Dana Wilgress représentant permanent auprès du Conseil de l'Atlantique Nord et de l'Organisation européenne de coopération économique. N.A. Robertson était haut-commissaire au Royaume-Uni, et Georges Vanier et Arnold Heeney ambassadeurs à Paris et à Washington respectivement. Événement tragique, Jack Thurrott est devenu le premier agent canadien du Service extérieur à mourir dans l'exercice de ses fonctions, sa jeep ayant roulé sur une mine pendant une patrouille de la Commission internationale de surveillance et de contrôle en Indochine.

Les dossiers du ministère des Affaires extérieures et du Bureau du Conseil privé ont été les sources principales des documents proposés dans le présent aperçu de la politique étrangère du Canada. Au besoin, nous avons fait appel aux documents personnels de nombreux ministres du Cabinet et hauts fonctionnaires qui ont été des acteurs dans ces événements, ainsi qu'aux dossiers des ministères de la Défense, du Commerce, des Pêches et des Finances. Pour préparer le présent volume, j'ai pu consulter sans restrictions les dossiers du ministère des Affaires extérieures et j'ai eu aussi largement accès à d'autres collections. On trouvera à la page xxvii la liste complète des sources étudiées en vue de la préparation du présent volume.

Le choix des documents est toujours guidé par les principes généraux énoncés dans l'introduction du volume 7 (p. ix -xi), mais ces principes ont été récemment revus pour qu'il soit possible, dans le cadre de la série, de faire face à l'augmentation constante de la documentation qui a accompagné l'expansion des responsabilités du Canada sur la scène internationale au lendemain de la Seconde Guerre mondiale. Cet examen a permis d'élaborer et d'approuver de nouvelles lignes directrices sur la présentation des textes. Les rédacteurs renonceront plus fréquemment, pour économiser de l'espace, à la pratique actuelle qui consiste à « laisser les documents parler d'eux-mêmes », et ils situeront les documents dans leur contexte au moyen de notes de présentation et de notes de bas de page. Ils pourraient également recourir de plus en plus à des documents résumés.

Bien qu'aucune règle inflexible ne puisse régir le choix des documents, la série traitera maintenant de façon plus appuyée des relations bilatérales et institutionnelles les plus importantes du Canada et des grandes crises internationales dans lesquelles le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures, le premier ministre ou d'autres membres du Cabinet ont dû prendre d'importantes décisions en matière de the Departments of Defence, Trade and Commerce, Fisheries, and Finance. In preparing this volume, I was given complete access to the files of the Department of External Affairs and generous access to other collections. A complete list of the sources examined in the preparation of this volume may be found on page xxvii.

While the selection of documents continues to be guided by the general principles set out in the Introduction to Volume 7 (pp. ix-xi), these have recently been reviewed in order to help the series deal with the constantly increasing amount of documentation that accompanied the expansion of Canada's international responsibilities after the Second World War. As a result of this review, some new editorial guidelines have been developed and approved. In order to save space, editors will more frequently abandon the present practice of 'letting the documents speak for themselves' and use introductory notes and footnotes to place documents in their proper context. In addition, editors may increasingly resort to summary documents.

Although there can be no hard and fast rules to govern the selection of documents, the series will now focus more intensively on Canada's most important bilateral and institutional relationships, and on the major international crises that directly involved the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Prime Minister or other members of the Cabinet in substantive policy decisions. Unfortunately, this means that Documents on Canadian External Relations will no longer be able to track recurring diplomatic tasks such as the opening of new posts or the negotiation of routine international agreements. By narrowing its focus in this way and by employing more summary documents and editorial interventions, however, the series will be able to continue to re-produce the most important despatches, telegrams and memoranda that constitute the raw material of diplomatic history.

The editorial devices used in this volume are similar to those described in the Introduction to Volume 9 (p. xix). A dagger (†) indicates a document that has not been printed and ellipses (...) an editorial excision. The phrase "group corrupt" indicates decryption problems in the transmission of the original telegram. Words and passages that are struck out by the author, marginal notes, and distribution lists are reproduced as footnotes only when significant. Unless otherwise indicated, it is assumed that documents have been read by the addressee. Proper and place names are standardized. The editor has silently corrected spelling, punctuation and capitalization, as well as transcription errors whose meaning is clear from their context. All other editorial additions to the body of the text are indicated by the use of square brackets. Documents are reprinted in either French or English, depending on their language of origin.

The task of editing this volume was made considerably easier by the help and support generously offered from many quarters. The staff at the National Archives of Canada were especially helpful. Paulette Dozois, Paul Marsden and Dave Smith of the Military and International Affairs Records Unit of the Government Archives Division responded promptly and professionally to my many (always urgent) inquiries. Janet Murray and Michel Poitras managed the circulation desk with cheerful efficiency, while Micheline Robert and Louise Bertrand helped ensure the safe and timely delivery of photocopies. Ciuneas Boyle, Access to Information Coordinator politique. Cela signifie, hélas, que la série Documents relatifs aux relations extérieures du Canada ne pourra plus rendre compte de tâches diplomatiques qui reviennent régulièrement, comme l'ouverture de nouvelles missions ou la négociation d'accords internationaux courants. Par contre, grâce à cette nouvelle optique plus étroite, à l'utilisation d'un plus grand nombre de documents résumés et à des interventions plus nombreuses des rédacteurs, il sera possible de continuer à reproduire les dépêches, télégrammes et notes de services les plus importants qui forment la matière première de l'histoire de la diplomatie.

Les conventions utilisées dans le présent volume sont semblables à celles décrites dans l'introduction du volume 9 (p. xix). La croix (†) indique que le document n'a pas été imprimé et les ellipses (...) une suppression. L'expression « altération » révèle l'existence de problèmes de déchiffrement dans la transmission du télégramme original. Les mots et les passages qui sont supprimés par l'auteur, les notes en marge et les listes de diffusion ne sont reproduits dans des notes de bas de page que lorsqu'ils revêtent une certaine importance. Sauf indication contraire, il est supposé que les documents ont été lus par leur destinataire. Les noms propres et les noms de lieu sont normalisés. Le rédacteur a corrigé discrètement l'orthographe, la ponctuation, les majuscules et les erreurs de transcriptions, lorsque le contexte révélait clairement le sens. Tous les ajouts du rédacteur dans le corps du texte sont indiqués par des crochets. Les documents sont reproduits en français ou en anglais, selon leur langue d'origine.

L'édition du présent volume a été considérablement facilitée par l'aide et le soutien généreux de nombre de services et de personnes. Le personnel des Archives nationales du Canada a été particulièrement utile. Paulette Dozois, Paul Marsden et Dave Smith, de la section des archives militaires et des affaires internationales, à la Division des archives gouvernementales, ont répondu avec empressement et compétence à mes nombreuses demandes de renseignements (toujours urgentes). Janet Murray et Michel Poitras se sont chargés du comptoir du prêt avec entrain et efficacité tandis que Micheline Robert et Louise Bertrand assuraient les services de photocopie en toute sécurité et avec célérité. Ciuneas Boyle, coordonnatrice de l'accès à l'information, au Bureau du Conseil privé, m'a gracieusement facilité la consultation des dossiers du Cabinet. Corrinne Miller m'a beaucoup aidé dans mon travail aux archives de la Banque du Canada.

Ted Kelly, rédacteur adjoint du présent volume, a sélectionné les documents pour les chapitres consacrés à l'ONU et à l'Europe. À toutes les étapes du projet, il a été d'un précieux conseil. Christopher Cook a continué d'assumer les fonctions d'adjoint principal de recherche, cherchant avec enthousiasme les documents perdus et les dossiers cachés, avec le concours de Joseph McHattie. Boris Stipernitz a aussi aidé à la recherche, compilé l'index et dépisté les erreurs de typographie dans le texte.

Steve Prince a passé en revue le document sur le conflit coréen et m'a épargné au moins une erreur qui aurait été très embarrassante. Angie Sauer était toujours là pour discuter du contexte général de la guerre froide dans lequel la politique étrangère du Canada a évolué. Norman Hillmer et Hector Mackenzie nous ont donné de solides conseils pratiques. John Hilliker, rédacteur en chef de la série Documents at the Privy Council Office, graciously facilitated my access to Cabinet records. Corrinne Miller greatly assisted my work in the archives of the Bank of Canada.

Ted Kelly, who assumes the position of assistant editor with this volume, edited the chapters on the United Nations and Europe. At every stage in the project, he was a source of helpful advice. Christopher Cook continued as my principal research assistant, locating lost documents and hidden files with enthusiasm. His work was supplemented by the efforts of Joseph McHattie. Boris Stipernitz also helped with the research, compiled the index and searched the text for typographical errors.

Steve Prince reviewed the material on the Korean Conflict and saved me from at least one embarrassing mistake. Angie Sauer was invariably available to discuss the broader Cold War context in which Canada's foreign policy evolved. Norman Hillmer and Hector Mackenzie assisted with sound and practical counsel. John Hilliker, the general editor of Documents on Canadian External Relations, played a large and constructive role in determining the evolving nature of this series and this volume. The series would not be possible without the continuing support of the director of the Corporate Communications Division, Simon Wade. I remain solely responsible for the final selection of documents in this volume.

The Historical Section continues to provide the supplementary text and coordinate the technical preparation of the volume. The manuscript was typed and formatted by Aline Gélneau. Gabrielle Nishiguchi located most of the photographs in this volume. Bruce Williams and Gayle Fraser also helped in my search for photographs. The department's translation bureau provided the French for the footnotes, captions and ancillary text. Francine Fournier and Nancy Sample, colleagues in the Corporate Communications Division, provided editorial guidance. Gail Kirkpatrick Devlin proofread the entire manuscript and composed the list of persons. In this latter task, she was assisted by Michael Stevenson. Finally and happily, Mary and Katherine Donaghy continued their close association with this documentary project.

relatifs aux relations extérieures du Canada, a joué un rôle très important et constructif dans la définition de la nature en évolution de cette série et du présent volume. Cette série ne serait pas possible sans le soutien constant du chef de la Direction des communications ministérielles, Simon Wade. Je demeure seul responsable du choix définitif des documents reproduits dans le présent volume.

La Section des affaires historiques continue de fournir le texte complémentaire et de coordonner la préparation technique du volume. Le manuscrit a été dactylographié et formaté par Aline Gélneau. Gabrielle Nishiguchi a trouvé la plupart des photographies reproduites dans le présent volume. Bruce Williams et Gayle Fraser m'ont également prêté main forte dans la recherche de photographies. Le service de traduction du ministère a produit le texte français des notes de bas de page, des légendes et des textes accessoires. Francine Fournier et Nancy Sample, collègues de la Direction des communications ministérielles, ont donné des conseils de rédaction et Gail Kirkpatrick Devlin s'est chargée de la relecture de l'ensemble du manuscrit et a dressé la liste des personnes. Pour cette dernière tâche, elle a pu compter sur l'aide de Michael Stevenson. Enfin, et heureusement, Mary et Katherine Donaghy ont continué à collaborer de près à ce projet de documentation.

KOREA — POLITICAL CONFERENCE
STATE DEPARTMENT MEETING OF JANUARY 4

Dean and Murphy met with representatives of the sixteen powers yesterday in order to have a general exchange of views on the political conference situation. Most of the discussion centered around the possibility of resuming the preliminary talks at Panmunjom and the problem of Soviet participation. The consensus of the meeting seemed to be, on the first point, that it would be desirable to have the Panmunjom discussions resumed but it was uncertain whether it would be helpful for this to be done before or after January 22, the date for the release of prisoners. On the second point there seemed to be general agreement that, while it would be preferable to have the Soviet Union participate in, and be bound by, the decisions of the conference, this should not be made a sticking point and a conference without the Soviet Union should be considered.

2. The New Zealand Ambassador emphasized the difficulty of the United Nations side suddenly making a volte face in its stand on Soviet participation. He said he thought that the suggestion for a conference without the Soviet Union would have to come from the Communist side. The French Ambassador observed that the Chinese could not directly propose the deletion of the Soviet Union, but he thought they might be doing this indirectly by coupling the matter of Soviet participation with the contentious issue of attendance by neutrals. He asserted that a change of attitude by the United Nations side on Soviet participation should not be too difficult, since by the Assembly resolution Soviet attendance at the conference was pegged specifically to the desire of the other side. The idea of the Soviet Union being requested to make a separate guarantee of the results of the conference was mentioned and supported by the British representative. Dean added as a matter of interest that, when he had had a conversation some time ago with Sohlam, the Swedish Ambassador to the U.S.S.R., who has the reputation of being an authority on Soviet affairs, the latter expressed doubt that the Soviet Union would attend the conference. He said he would expect the U.S.S.R. to watch the conference with interest and seek some bargaining advantage from it afterwards by trying to extract concession from the Western Allies as a price for adhering to its decisions. We have given Murphy an informal minute containing your views on Soviet participation as described in EX-2202 of December 30.¹

3. As to resumption of the Panmunjom talks, there was some difference of opinion whether it would be preferable for this to be brought about before January 22 or not. The New Zealand Ambassador, speaking personally, expressed the opinion that there would be less tension in the meetings if they were resumed after the POW question had been disposed of. The British representative took the contrary view, on the grounds that if the talks were not resumed before January 22, their reestablishment would be made more difficult by action which might be taken regarding the prisoners-of-war and by consequent mounting pressure for a General Assembly meeting. He suggested also that failure to resume the talks would add complications to the forthcoming Berlin conference. The French Ambassador supported him, saying that the United Nations intentions with regard to prisoners-of-war were in any case well known to the Communist side.

4. Dean said that if the talks are resumed there must be a formal agreement as to how they ought to be renewed. It would not be wise to drift back to Panmunjom. All agreed that there should be no appearance of pleading with the Communists for resumption of the talks, but it was thought that it might be possible to give an indication to the Communists that the United Nations side is willing for the talks to be resumed if satisfactory arrangements can be made. Dean thought that soundings could be taken either through the Indians on the Military Armistice Commission or through the Swedish Ambassador in Peking, with the former method perhaps preferable as being more non-committal.

5. The unwontedly conciliatory attitude of Yang, the Korean Ambassador, was noticeable at the meeting. He made several carefully phrased and constructive interventions on the theme that the sooner a conference is held the better. State Department officials told us after the meeting in private conversation that they were uncertain whether Yang was acting on instructions from his government or for reasons of his own.

6. Dean said that the United States had not reached firm decisions on the matters which had been discussed and that he would meet with the sixteen to consider them again. We should appreciate receiving any further views which you might wish us to express.

7. Dean made a few remarks about the problem of voting procedure, which will be reported in a separate message.

KOREA — POLITICAL CONFERENCE

I am inclined to agree with the British and French representatives who at the State Department meeting of January 4 favored the resumption of the Panmunjom talks before January 22. To the two arguments advanced by the British representative for such timing, I would add these:

- (a) the longer the recess, the more difficult it will be to resume the talks; and
- (b) if they are resumed before the General Assembly is reconvened, it will be easier to avoid discussion there on the Political Conference.

2. I have been glad to note Dean's public expression of opinion that the negotiations would get under way again in the near future, and the comment of the State Department Press Officer not only that the possibility of resumption has been under discussion through intermediaries at Panmunjom but also that every avenue of approach towards resumption would be examined.

3. Concerning the principal point at issue in the negotiations, namely the status of Soviet participation, I continue to hold the views expressed in my EX-2202 of December 30, 1953. It is pleasing to note that similar conclusions are being reached in other quarters. I would hope that the "third party" approach as a means of enabling the Soviet Union to participate in a manner satisfactory to both sides might also provide a suitable line for coping with the problem of neutral membership. I doubt that the participation of the Soviet Union and India (and perhaps other neutrals) according to the same formula need affect in any way the quite different roles which these countries might be expected to play at the Conference.

4. As for the problem of voting procedure, your teletype WA-11 of January 5† gives reason for optimism that Dean and the State Department may succeed in reducing this question to manageable proportions. This in fact has only been a problem because the Communists were determined to make it one.

5. The State Department will probably have accumulated a good deal of comment on various subjects pertaining to resumed negotiations and presumably is now devising new strategy. This should entail a revision of the written statement of proposals which Dean tabled at Panmunjom on December 8 and which you quoted in your WA-2810 of December 8.² It would be helpful if the State Department could make available to us any amendments they propose to make to these proposals sufficiently in advance of reaching a firm decision on them to give us time for study and comment.

KOREA — DISPOSITION OF PRISONERS

I attach copies of the following telegrams from our High Commissioner in New Delhi:

No. 318 of December 28, 1953

No. 4 of January 6, 1954†

No. 15 of January 11, 1954†

According to these telegrams, the Indian Government has instructed General Thimayya, Chairman of the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission, to inform the opposing Commands in Korea that, in the event of their failing to reach a new agreement on the disposition of prisoners, India will declare on January 21 reversion of the prisoners to their status before the 120-day period of custody by the Commission began. Thereafter, the prisoners would be returned to the former detaining sides. India has requested the President of the General Assembly to reconvene the Eighth Session between January 23 and February 23, 1954. The date will presumably be February 9.

2. The prime reason for the Indian request that the Session be resumed would seem to be their desire to obtain Assembly endorsement for their actions in Korea concerning disposition of prisoners. We are somewhat apprehensive about the difficulties of supporting an Indian report to the resumed Session on this matter if that report should have only the support of the Polish and Czech members of the Repatriation Commission.

3. Teletypes of January 11, No. WA-41† from our Washington Embassy and No. 18† from our Permanent Delegation in New York, copies of which are attached, report State Department concern about the implications of Madame Pandit's request for replies on the proposal for the resumed Session to be received by January 22. The former teletype also reports the State Department opinion that more information about the Indian request is necessary and their suggestion that the U.N. members with forces in Korea should, before reaching a decision concerning the convening of the Assembly on February 9, know what the Indians are going to ask the Assembly to do and reach a common attitude toward the request.

4. In his telegram No. 15, Mr. Reid says that Mr. Menon will be calling on him soon to discuss in more detail the action India intends to take concerning the disposition of prisoners. In these circumstances you might wish to consider for despatch the attached draft telegram to New Delhi, repeated to London, Washington and our Permanent Delegation in New York, which draft informs Mr. Reid of our concern lest the Indians explain their actions relating to prisoners in a manner likely to cause embarrassment to their friends, and of our interest in knowing why the Indians want replies by January 22 and what form of endorsement the Indians will wish to obtain from the Assembly during the reconvened Session.

Thank you for your helpful telegrams under reference.

2. I suppose it would be possible for India to declare on January 21 that the prisoners have reverted to their status before the 120-day period began and to hand over the prisoners in the south camp to the U.N. Command on the basis of this Indian interpretation of the relevant provisions of the Armistice Agreement while the UNC might receive them on the basis of an interpretation that they had automatically recovered their civilian status. Such move would result in the factual release of these prisoners on or shortly after January 22. On the other hand, since the Communists want custody of prisoners maintained, the Indians and/or the Repatriation Commission might be expected to have a wrangle over any attempt to return the north camp prisoners to the Communists. I am assuming, of course that the Indians will not continue to hold the prisoners after January 22 if either or both of the opposing Commands disagree with the Indian interpretation.

3. I am not clear how India can take full responsibility for decisions on disposition of prisoners unless perhaps as Executive Agent of Repatriation Commission. Since Swiss and Swedish members wish prisoners released as civilians January 22 and Polish and Czech members want them held thereafter, it is difficult to see how India can swing a Commission majority to its view.

4. In U.N. Assembly debate concerning the reconvening of the Eighth Session, Menon stressed importance India attached to Assembly sharing responsibility for the decisions India would make relating to prisoners on January 22. Whether India will get the desired Assembly endorsement will, of course, depend on what India requests the Assembly to endorse. If the Indian decisions result in the release of the prisoners, then it should not be difficult for India's friends to express warm appreciation for the valuable services performed by India and the Commission, provided the Assembly is not asked to support a majority report such as that conveyed to the opposing Commands by General Thimayya on December 28 in which India is associated with the Polish and Czech members in the expression of certain views with which we may not agree. We may expect the Soviet and other Communist delegates to try to turn to their advantage any majority report of the Commission in which the Indians went along with the Polish and Czech members. This would increase the difficulties of India's friends approving such a report. Perhaps if instead of backing a report which assessed blame, the Indian delegation were to confine themselves to an objective statement of what had taken place and the views of the two Commands, the difficulties I foresee might be overcome, since the Assembly could then express appreciation for services rendered without reaching any conclusion concerning the merits of the two sides. This might be the easiest course of action for India to pursue if, as I expect, the turnback of prisoners to the opposing Commands will stem from a unilateral Indian decision.

5. Madame Pandit's suggestion that the Session be resumed on February 9 and her request that views of member Governments concerning resumption be communicated by January 22, with its implications concerning the prisoners, have disturbed the State Department. For your information they feel that it would be easier to reply favorably after January 22 but have also suggested that the U.N. members with troops in Korea should, before reaching a decision concerning February 9, know what the Indians are going to ask the Assembly to do, and reach a common attitude towards the request. While I am not espousing these views, it would be helpful to know why the Indians want replies by January 22 and what form of endorsement the Indians will wish to obtain from the Assembly during the reconvened Session.

6. I am not sure that the Indians will be able to complete their business in Korea concerned with the transfer of the prisoners and the preparation of a report on Commission proceedings in time to permit adequate consultation with friendly Governments before February 9 on a report which must be the meat of the reconvened Session. You might take informal soundings as to the consideration the Indians have given to this problem.

7. I hope you will find the above views helpful for your forthcoming discussion with Menon. Ends.

RECONVENING OF EIGHTH GENERAL ASSEMBLY — MEETING OF SIXTEEN

Following from George, Begins: A meeting of the 16 was called this afternoon on two hours notice in Wadsworth's office at the United States mission. Although disclaiming any desire to secure "a decision" of the group, Wadsworth was clearly under instructions to do what he could to gain the support of the 16 for some move to postpone the deadline of January 22 which Madame Pandit has set for replies to her proposal to reconvene the Assembly on February 9.

2. Wadsworth explained that the United States could not at present, or at any time before the 22nd, give an affirmative answer to Madame Pandit's request. Although he thought a negative answer might have to be given, he indicated an abstention was more likely, but the United States Government would much prefer to postpone the deadline. He was moreover strongly opposed in principle to the President's suggestion that she should count as affirmative votes those who did not reply to her proposal by January 22.

3. Almost everyone of those present, speaking for themselves and without instructions, agreed that to count non voters as affirmative voters would create an unfortunate precedent in United Nations circles, where the right to abstain is well established. The majority of representatives including the United Kingdom also supported the view that it would be difficult to reply to the President's communication by January 22 and they would prefer a postponement of the deadline. I did not comment on this point. There was however, considerable difference of opinion as to how we should proceed towards securing a postponement.

4. Wadsworth proposed that this should be done by a formal communication from the 16 to the Secretary-General on which he could base a request to the President for a postponement of the deadline on the grounds that a number of the principal delegations concerned would find themselves in difficulties unless a postponement were granted. This proposal was supported by the Greeks and Turks. The French, the Philippines and ourselves, on the other hand, suggested that any formal approach of this kind might be used to advantage by Communist propaganda particularly in Asia as indicating western reluctance to reconvene the Assembly. This, said Wadsworth, did not bother him. We managed nevertheless to get him to agree:

(a) That no attempt should be made to get the 16 to take collective formal action but that any approaches to the Secretary-General or to the Indians should be individual.

(b) That if any of us were to suggest informally and individually a postponement of the deadline we should not request an indefinite postponement (as Wadsworth had at first indicated) but a postponement no further than February 1.

(c) We should not tell the press what we had discussed beyond saying that we had held preliminary consultations concerning Madame Pandit's communication.

5. The United States, Greek and Turkish delegations will probably give the Secretary-General their views in writing tomorrow indicating their objections to silence implying consent and their preference for postponement of the deadline until February 1.

6. Hoppenot, the French representative, plans to see the Secretary-General on his return to New York tomorrow afternoon but will give him nothing in writing. One or two other delegations from among the 16 are also planning to let the Secretary-General know informally that they hope the President can be persuaded to postpone her deadline.

7. During our meeting there was general agreement that though the Indian delegation might wish for nothing more than an Assembly blessing for their stewardship in Korea, once the Assembly met it would be next to impossible to restrict debate to the question of the prisoners and that if the Indians did not raise political questions concerning Chinese representation or participation and membership of the Political Conference, the USSR would.

8. This led the Colombian representative to point out that if the resumed session were to last more than two or three weeks, it would cause difficulties for the Latin American delegations whose foreign ministers and in some cases permanent delegates were committed to attend the Conference of American States convening in Caracas on March 1.

9. Largely for this reason, a suggestion for convening the Assembly between February 15 and 20 which was put forward by the representatives of Belgium and the Netherlands was dropped and in spite of obvious United States misgivings no one else spoke against postponing the date proposed for reconvening the Assembly beyond February 9. Wadsworth however was not prepared to commit himself as to whether his government could agree to February 9 in any circumstances and it was only with considerable reluctance that he agreed to the majority view that a postponement of Madame Pandit's deadline to a fixed date (about February 1) was desirable. Because of his opposition, a Netherlands proposal to agree in principle to an Assembly meeting some time before February 22 was also dropped; but Wadsworth alone felt that the Indian argument for a meeting before the N.N.R.C. is dissolved did not hold water as the logical time for it to report was after its dissolution.

10. As regards the interpretation of the number of votes needed to reconvene the Assembly, opinions were divided. Most representatives, including the United States understood that 31 affirmative votes were required but the United Kingdom representative, Crosthwaite, maintained that a majority of those replying would be sufficient, even if Madame Pandit did not count silence as consent.

11. In any case, from the information pooled on the attitudes of other delegations, it seems difficult to say at present whether Madame Pandit would secure 31 affirmative votes if she sticks to her present position. One or two Arabs have indicated that they were unhappy with the January 22 deadline and the representatives of the Philippines and of Thailand said the same at our meeting. The Latins will meet tomorrow afternoon to consider their attitude, but most of them would prefer a postponement of the deadline. All in all, it was considered that Madame Pandit's proposal for reconvening the Assembly on February 9 would secure general support only if she would agree to postpone the deadline for replies until February 1 and interpret silence as an abstention. Of the 16 I should think that only three or four (United States, Greece and Turkey and perhaps one other) might fail to support reconvening on February 9 in these circumstances. If it is granted that the Indians deserve an opportunity to report to the Assembly, as was agreed informally before the Assembly recessed, a date later than February 9 would probably prove very inconvenient for the Latins. If the Panmunjom talks are not resumed in the meantime, the pressure for reconvening the Assembly will of course increase. Ends.

RECONVENING OF THE EIGHTH GENERAL ASSEMBLY — UNITED KINGDOM VIEWS

The United Kingdom delegation received this morning new instructions from the Foreign Office. The United Kingdom Government are now satisfied that the Indians will in fact return the prisoners to the two commands, and on this basis the Foreign Office think that instead of waiting until after the 22nd they should reply with better grace now agreeing to Madame Pandit's proposal.

2. The Foreign Office had previously been going on nothing more official than what Menon had told their High Commissioner in New Delhi as to what the Indian Government would do about the prisoners on or before January 23. They now have received from Pillai the full text of the Indian Government's letter, extracts from which were quoted in Madame Pandit's communication to the Secretary-General of January 10. From the full text it is clear that the Indian Government has made a firm decision

- (a) that the custodial force "cannot but cease its duties on January 23", and
- (b) must restore the prisoners to their respective sides.

Pillai has told the United Kingdom High Commissioner in New Delhi that all the prisoners would be restored to their respective commands by January 22, reverting to their status quo before they were placed in the custody of the Indian troops.

3. The Foreign Office have instructed the United Kingdom Embassy in Washington to inform the State Department of their documentary evidence for a firm Indian decision having been taken and their present disposition to accept Madame Pandit's proposal promptly. The United Kingdom delegation have given the same information to the French delegation here and as a result Hoppenot has called off his intended visit to the Secretary-General. The United Kingdom are hoping that Wadsworth can also be persuaded to hold off until there has been a chance for further consultations in Washington.

4. This change in the United Kingdom Government's approach will, I think, have a considerable effect on the attitude of a number of other delegations who had indicated at the meeting of the 16 yesterday their preference for a postponement of the deadline.

5. There will probably have to be a further meeting of the 16 here early next week.

RECONVENING OF THE ASSEMBLY

Following from Holmes, Begins: We have been delaying a decision on the reconvening of the Assembly until we have a reply from Delhi to the questions raised in our telegram No. 12 of January 13, which has been repeated to you. In the meantime, for your own information, the Minister thinks that we shall find ourselves morally committed to accepting the Indian request for an Assembly on February 9. In view of the fact that we had urged them not to convene the Assembly before January 22, they would have reason to be aggrieved if we did not support their calling the meeting after that date. He does not think therefore that we should involve ourselves in any collective action by the sixteen and would approve the negative stand taken by George in Wednesday's meeting.

2. We are of course not very happy about Mrs. Pandit's interpretation of the failure to reply by the twenty-second and hope to send you shortly our views on the technical problem of what constitutes a majority. We are not happy either about the communication from Thimayya to the U.N.C. which, according to this morning's paper, makes the point that any change in the status of prisoners after their release by the U.N.C. would be a breach of the armistice. This reply is almost certain to make the debate in the Assembly more cantankerous and make it more difficult for us to applaud and approve the Indian performance in the N.N.R.C. We hope that the nature of this reply among other things will be clarified by further word from Delhi. In the meantime we would be glad to be kept posted on the changing attitudes of other countries.

3. The following is the text of an answer given yesterday in the House of Commons by the Minister to an inquiry by Mr. Diefenbaker as to the Canadian position on this subject:

"No decision has been taken with regard to this matter, but one will naturally be taken within the next few days. Before reaching a decision we have made some inquiries of the Indian Government as to what they expect to be on the agenda at this session of the United Nations assembly that is being called, and we are also consulting with our friends with respect to this matter. We will be able to make a decision within a few days."

KOREA — DISPOSITION OF PRISONERS

Your telegram was most helpful in the hour's talk which I had with Krishna Menon this morning at my request. He leaves tomorrow, January 16th, for London, will be in London for a week beginning January 18th and will arrive in New York on January 28th for meeting of Trusteeship Council.

2. The following summarizes his views which he insisted were personal:

(a) Date of January 22nd. This date was selected because it is ten days after the sending out of notice and because it would give member states about a fortnight to get their representatives to New York following their receipt of call which would presumably be sent out January 23rd and January 24th. There was nothing "Machiavellian" in the selection of this call and there is no, repeat no, "sanctity" about date.

(b) In no, repeat no, circumstances, unless the two Commands agree, would India continue to hold prisoners after January 22nd or continue the life of the Commission beyond its prescribed date.

(c) The northern Command may well not, repeat not, accept the return of their prisoners who have been well behaved and who, Menon seems to assume, will walk north once they have the opportunity.

(d) The reason it was necessary for Thimayya to inform the Commands that in India's view it was not, repeat not, proper for the Commands to release prisoners after receiving them from India is that India has the duty so long as it is Chairman to interpret the Agreement and India is turning the prisoners over to the United Nations Command, knowing that the United States intention is to release them.

(e) India considers it has done everything it possibly can to accommodate the wishes of the United Nations Command as far as possible without India itself declaring the release of prisoners to civilian status.

(f) So far as conflicting views expressed in report of December 28th, India has no, repeat no, desire to create difficulty in the Assembly. Moreover, the Assembly is not, repeat not, a judicial body and has no, repeat no, direct knowledge of the facts.

(g) In addition to interim report of December 28th, there will have to be a final report of the Commission.

(h) As Chairman, India will also have to make an explanation to the Assembly of its actions.

3. I failed to elicit from Menon any clear indication of what the Indians are going to ask the Assembly to do and I am almost certain that they have not, repeat not, made up their minds. He fears that, as on at least two occasions in the past, India will be asked not, repeat not, to present a resolution which will make the task of its friends more difficult and will then be faced, without notice, by a resolution drafted by the United States and approved by 16 countries with forces in Korea. You might wish to ask Norman Robertson to discuss the matter with him in London. My tentative feeling is that the best chance of minimizing an acrimonious debate in the Assembly might be to sound out the Americans immediately with regard to whether they would be prepared to accept a resolution which would do little more than "express warm appreciation for the valuable services performed by India and the Commission" (Paragraph 4 of your telegram). If the Americans were prepared to accept this, Menon might be sounded out, preferably before he leaves London, and he might agree to recommend this to the Indian Government.

4. Political Conference. Menon, while convinced of Dean's sincerity when he went to Korea, is inclined to believe that the United States strung out discussions at Panmunjom until after the Assembly recessed in order to be able to argue that the Assembly should not, repeat not, discuss the Political Conference. He is suspicious that they will resume discussions at Panmunjom and carry them on through the reconvened meeting of the Assembly for the same purpose. He thinks that the only way of reaching an agreement on holding of the Political Conference is through mediation with India. The Assembly might be asked to request India to assist the two parties in reaching an agreement or alternatively, the Assembly might pass a resolution setting forth certain principles on which the conference would be held though not, repeat not, being specific about membership and requesting India to use this resolution as a basis of discussion with the Chinese. He does not, repeat not, think a political conference would reach agreement but he believes as long as it is meeting the possibility of war would be reduced. Moreover, it could take over responsibility from Military Armistice Commission and could set up machinery to keep the peace pending a formal peace settlement.

5. Menon as you know is becoming more and more pessimistic about the possibility of the Allies of the United States such as the United Kingdom and Canada exercising their independence of judgment on matters in which the United States takes a firm line. He instanced as an example of this what he understands has been the inactivity of the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand and Canada on questions of United States military aid to Pakistan.³

RECONVENING OF GENERAL ASSEMBLY

1. I saw Mr. Hammarskjöld this morning and discussed with him the Indian request for the reconvening of the Eighth General Assembly.

2. As a result of consultations with a number of delegations, Mr. Hammarskjöld said that he had on January 15 cabled Mme. Pandit making two points. He had first recommended that she extend the deadline of January 22 by one week. Secondly, he reported to her the concern of many delegations (which he told Mme. Pandit he shared) that silence should be interpreted as implying concurrence, and suggested to Mme. Pandit that she might wish to reconsider her position on this point. Mme. Pandit replied that she accepted the delay of one week. Mme. Pandit said she did not think that the second point was now of much importance because of the delay of one week. Though she did not abandon her position, she gave the Secretary-General discretion to decide whether failure to reply constituted concurrence. The Secretary-General, exercising the discretion given to him, notified members as reported in our teletype No. 36 that members not replying will not be regarded as concurring. Mr. Hammarskjöld said that he considers that 31 member states must positively indicate concurrence before the General Assembly is reconvened.

3. The Secretary-General said that only the following countries had formally agreed to the President's request: The Soviet Bloc (which urged an earlier date than February 9), Iraq and Liberia. De la Colina of Mexico told the Secretary-General that he thought that the Latin American Bloc would, generally speaking, follow Washington's line on the main issue, namely whether or not the General Assembly should be reconvened. De la Colina had also said that if the Assembly is to be reconvened, the date should be about February 9 or well after March 1 in order not to conflict with the Pan-American Conference scheduled for early March in Caracas.

4. As regards the general question of whether or not the General Assembly should be reconvened, Mr. Hammarskjöld's views were along these lines. He had considered all along that if the Indian Government wished "absolution from the General Assembly" for the role they had played as Chairman of the Repatriation Commission, they were entitled to receive it. Mr. Hammarskjöld had envisaged a short, formal meeting of the General Assembly to approve the arrangements made by the Indians for the disposal of prisoners of war and to express appreciation for the thankless role which they had undertaken. Mr. Hammarskjöld regretted recent developments. He thought that Mme. Pandit had unnecessarily irritated some members by the terms of her letter requesting concurrence in the reconvening of the General Assembly and alarmed others by her statement reported in today's Times to the effect that the problem of Korea was a desperate one that had to be reviewed by the General Assembly in the context of new developments. (Mr. Hammarskjöld does not relish the prospect of a general debate on Korean matters in the General Assembly and, in an effort to avoid it, he urges Mr. Arthur Dean to return to Korea as soon as he possibly can in order to get the talks resumed at Panmunjom.)

5. Mr. Hammarskjöld also deplored the statement in General Thimayya's letter to the effect that the release to civilian status of the prisoners of war by the United Nations Command would be a violation of the armistice agreement unless (a) the other side agreed, or (b) there had been a political conference.⁴ Mr. Hammarskjöld realized that this interpretation, which he, like you, considers was gratuitous advice on the part of General Thimayya, will provoke an embarrassing and bitter debate in the Assembly. Notwithstanding the unfortunate recent developments, Mr. Hammarskjöld considers that on balance it would be in the interests of the United Nations for members to agree to the reconvening of the General Assembly.

6. I asked Mr. Hammarskjöld if the Legal Department of the Secretariat had given a legal interpretation of the armistice agreement on the point made by General Thimayya. He said they had not and he doubted if he would ask them to do so because the question was so charged with political considerations. Mr. Hammarskjöld pointed out that there were at least four interpretations:

- (a) The Indian interpretation as given by General Thimayya;
- (b) The Swedish interpretation to the effect that the Repatriation Commission should itself release the prisoners of war to civilian status and leave them free to go wherever they like;

⁴ Voir New York Times, le 15 janvier 1954./See New York Times, January 15, 1954.

(c) The Swiss interpretation which would have blurred the issue by simply providing that the Repatriation Commission should permit the prisoners of war to go where they liked on January 22; and

(d) The United States interpretation.

Mr. Hammarskjöld said that in discussing the matter with his associates in the Secretariat, he had reached the conclusion that what he called the Swiss interpretation was perhaps the best way out. Mr. Hammarskjöld thinks that General Thimayya personally agreed with the Swiss view, but under instructions from New Delhi had given a new interpretation which Mr. Hammarskjöld had never heard of before reading General Thimayya's letter of January 14.

7. I told Mr. Hammarskjöld that I was not yet in a position to give our reply to the President's request for concurrence in the reconvening of the General Assembly. I added that before the publication of General Thimayya's letter of January 14 you had been inclined to agree with the Indian request, but that now you were not sure that the advantages of holding a General Assembly might not be outweighed by the disadvantages. You were reconsidering the matter and we would, I said, let him have our views in due course.

KOREA — RECONVENING OF GENERAL ASSEMBLY

As you know we have all along recognized and respected the Indian desire to make a report to the General Assembly on its handling of the non-repatriate prisoners of war. We expected that that report would be one which would have the support of the majority of members of the United Nations. We had understood that the Indians wished the Assembly to share the responsibility for taking a decision to release the prisoners of war to civilian status on January 23 against the views of the Communists.

2. India has come to conclusions about the interpretation of the Armistice Agreement regarding the right of the non-repatriate P.O.W.'s to be released to civilian status on January 23 which differ from those which we anticipated in approving the idea of reconvening the General Assembly.

3. We believe that this Indian interpretation will not be accepted by the great majority of the United Nations members. It certainly is not accepted by us as it would make meaningless the United Nations resolution dealing with this problem and which, as Menon must know, was accepted by the Americans only on the distinct and explicit understanding that there would be a cut-off date for prisoners of war.

4. The statement in General Thimayya's letter of January 14 to the U.N. Command that he will regard any unilateral action on the part of either Command to release the prisoners of war to civilian status on January 23 as not in conformity with the Armistice Agreement appears unnecessary. We can understand the Indians wanting to make some sort of statement to make clear the basis on which they were releasing the prisoners to the custody of the Commands but it seems to us unfortunate that they should have projected their judgment on anticipated actions of the U.N. Command. The manner in which they have done this combined with their request for a reconvening of the Assembly opens up the prospect of an angry public postmortem on the disposition of prisoners. Such a meeting could widen the unhappy breach between the Americans and the Indians and prove particularly embarrassing to members of the Commonwealth.

5. We are informed that the U.N. Command will make a report on the P.O.W. situation and we think that the Indians should know that we will support the U.N.C. action in releasing the P.O.W.'s to civilian status on January 23 as entirely consistent with the U.N. General Assembly Resolution on this subject.

6. We don't know whether the Indians will seek to justify, in detail, before the General Assembly their handling of P.O.W's although we are told that the Indian Government's letter to Madame Pandit suggests this possibility and we would be glad to have further information on this subject. The publication of the U.N.C. report may further strengthen the Indian intention to make a full explanation of their position. We anticipate that the Soviet, Polish and Czech delegates will seek to exploit the Indian views to the limit.

7. In these circumstances we anticipate a difficult session, if one is convened, in which many of India's friends will be bound to state publicly that they disagree with India's interpretation of the Armistice Agreement regarding release of P.O.W's. They will also be bound to support the U.N.C. position in releasing the P.O.W's. While we will do our best to ensure that the Assembly recognizes the services rendered by India in this difficult undertaking we are depressed by the prospect of these public differences with India at this time and are beginning to wonder whether the convening of the resumed session now will do more harm than good.

8. The prisoner of war question held up the conclusion of an armistice for 18 months. It was our clear understanding that the formula worked out in the General Assembly in December, 1952 on Indian initiative and later incorporated in the Armistice Agreement, provided for the automatic release of prisoners after a certain fixed period. We consider that this P.O.W. question must be got out of the way in a practical manner before progress can be made toward a political settlement. We would have thought that the Indians in their desire to facilitate and play a helpful part in the political conference would have been more conscious of this aspect. While the Indians may have been dissatisfied with some of the conditions under which the N.N.R.C. was expected to perform its functions we are surprised that they should, in the light of all the circumstances, wish to make a public issue of this matter and thus, as it seems to us, make it more difficult to get on with tackling the political problems of the Korean settlement. If Menon's views about an increased mediating role for India in the political settlement conveyed in your telegram No. 19 of January 15 are shared by the Government of India, surely they should realize that in pressing publicly these differences over handling the prisoners of war they are bound to make it much more difficult to secure approval from the ROK Government and broad sections of United States opinion for Indian participation in the Political Conference.

9. I should be grateful if you would convey the above intimation of preliminary Canadian views to the Indian authorities and let me have a report by telegram.

10. For your own information I am inclined to think that if the Indians persist in wishing for a meeting of the Assembly, in spite of the differences that will be made public there, an argument can be made that we should agree to the request because the denial of a hearing would be adversely exploited by Communist propagandists in Asia. They have, however, in recent statements from General Thimayya and in New Delhi made such agreement more difficult. I would be glad to have your comment.

KOREA — RECONVENING OF GENERAL ASSEMBLY

1. Cook of the United States delegation, on instructions, telephoned me this morning to give the considered United States views on the Indian request for the reconvening of the General Assembly.

2. The United States Government sees no point, Cook said, in reconvening the General Assembly at the present time. Hence, the United States, having by letter dated January 15 already replied to the President's communication, do not intend to send any further communication.

3. The United States has considered the two main reasons why the Indian Government wish the Assembly to reconvene (namely the reports of the NNRC and the deadlock in arranging for the political conference) and have come to the conclusion that on neither ground is the reconvening of the General Assembly justified.

4. As regards the NNRC, whatever the conflicting views about the disposition of the prisoners of war may be, the fact of the matter is, Cook said, that the prisoners have now been released by the Indians and will in a day or two be declared civilians by the United Nations Command. Thus the problem has been solved. Any debate on the activities of the NNRC in the General Assembly would be academic, fruitless and give rise to bitter recriminations.

5. As regards the political conference, the United States view is that the differences between the two sides are more likely to be worked out in meetings between them than "if the General Assembly gets into the act itself". If the Communists considered that the General Assembly was about to reconvene, they would obviously refrain from negotiations in the hope, Cook said, of throwing the whole issue back into the Assembly where India would no doubt come up with proposals which might result in splitting the 16 "which we want to avoid at all costs". A General Assembly session would also create difficulties with regard to representation of Chinese Communists and North Koreans.

6. For all these reasons the United States is not now prepared to agree to the resumption of the General Assembly or to set any date for resumption.

7. Cook referred to press reports yesterday that Mme. Pandit had said it was necessary for the General Assembly to decide the fate of the prisoners of war who wished to go to neutral countries. Cook pointed out that under the armistice agreement the NNRC and the Indian Red Cross are the authorities charged with assisting those who wish to go to neutral countries.

8. Cook said that the United States would be most grateful to receive the views of the Canadian Government.

KOREA — RECONVENING OF GENERAL ASSEMBLY

1. [Charles] Ritchie and I saw Krishna Menon this morning. I showed him your telegram under reference. He observed that this was a politer and less reproachful message than those which were pouring in on them from the Chinese. He then proceeded to justify in detail everything that General Thimayya had done and said. It was altogether a pretty unprofitable half hour. He had to leave to catch Selwyn Lloyd at the station, whence Lloyd was leaving for his constituency, but is coming back to see me this afternoon when time will be no object.

2. We were both disturbed by his readiness to put the worst construction on everything the Americans had done or left undone, and really worried about how things may go in an Assembly at which he was leading the Indian delegation.

3. I did not get the impression that the Indians had any second thoughts about the desirability of summoning the Assembly. He thought it quite possible that there would be no meeting of the Assembly, but if so this would be the result of an adverse American decision supported by their thirty-one faithful voters.

4. The practical pragmatic argument against an Assembly was very well put in your message to New Delhi and your fears, I think, are confirmed by our conversation with Menon. Nevertheless, I myself am inclined to think on balance that the least objectionable course would be, for the reasons which are pretty well stated in the United Kingdom telegram to Washington which has been repeated to you through Earncliffe (Y. No. 21 of January 22),† to try to persuade the Americans to agree to summoning the Assembly for February 16.

5. Selwyn Lloyd, whom I saw yesterday, thought your message to New Delhi a very constructive and helpful one. He was anxious to learn what the Indian response to it had been, but said that the Foreign Secretary and himself still held strongly to the judgment which they had put up to Washington before knowing of your approach to New Delhi.

6. Butterworth, who is in charge of the American Embassy here told me that Lloyd had spoken to him in the sense of the telegram to Washington, in the hope that the State Department, in transmitting the British message to Dulles in Berlin, would recommend support for these conclusions.

KOREA — RECONVENING OF GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Your telegram received January 22nd. I saw Secretary-General at noon January 23rd and conveyed recent Canadian views to him orally. He will transmit them to the Prime Minister when he returns to Delhi on Monday January 25th.

2. The following summarizes the views expressed by the Secretary-General:

(a) Explanation of Indian action in interpreting armistice agreement in Thimayya's letter. That section of the letter had been drafted in a hurry in New Delhi. Moreover, apparently Chinese had, in substance, accused the Indians of acting in collusion with the United Nations Command in transferring prisoners and it was considered necessary to go some way to rebut this charge. Indian interpretation reflects in large measure the views which the Prime Minister has consistently taken in public recently (see for example my despatch No. 1273 of December 30th, 1953).

(b) In spite of the kind considerations set forth in your telegram it is almost certain the Prime Minister would not, repeat not, agree to withdraw Indian request for a reconvening of the General Assembly.

(c) On the basis of latest information which he has received, the Secretary-General assumes the meeting will be held on 9th February or possibly 16th February.

(d) It is impossible to say now what line Menon will take in the Assembly, but Menon's own inclination may well be to give a detailed justification of what India has done.

3. During course of discussions, Pillai expressed, in greatest confidence, the following personal views. The only person who could exercise effective control over Menon would be the Prime Minister of India himself. Therefore once it becomes clear that a meeting of the Assembly is to take place you might wish to instruct me to see the Prime Minister and to put before him your views on steps which Indian representative at General Assembly might usefully take to reduce to a minimum the kind of unfortunate and even dangerous consequences of a debate in the Assembly which you suggest in your telegram might occur. The Prime Minister has a very high respect for your judgment and my conversation with him might result in a firm telegram from him to Menon.

4. Reference para 10 of your telegram. I am inclined to believe that if, as is highly probable, Indians will not, repeat not, withdraw their request for a meeting of the Assembly, the lesser evil might be to agree to their request. I assume you would, in any event, not repeat not, wish to adopt a more unyielding position on this than such country as the United Kingdom.

KOREA — RECONVENING GENERAL ASSEMBLY

I think we should indicate to the State Department that the Canadian Government is now disposed to agree to an early meeting of the General Assembly. We still have doubts as to what would be accomplished during an Assembly but there are other considerations which have led us to this conclusion — in addition to the consideration contained in telegram 349 of January 21[†] from the Foreign Office.

2. Reconvening the Session would provide an opportunity for the Assembly to endorse the U.N.C. release of prisoners. Such endorsement would exert a useful influence on public opinion in Asia. On the other hand, the use of the voting strength of Latin American States to prevent reconvening and hence to deny the Indians a hearing, might be misinterpreted in the African and Asian world, and add unnecessarily to the sense of frustration which perhaps arose at the reconvened Seventh Session through the debate on Indian participation in the Political Conference.

3. More important for us is the fact that Canada was one of the countries which urged India to take over the chairmanship of the N.N.R.C. Also, in working for a compromise between the U.S. and Indian view last autumn, Canada, like the U.K., incurred a certain obligation not to stand in the way of the Indians reporting to the Assembly early in the New Year on their conduct of N.N.R.C. duties. The Indians now want a hearing and we feel that we must give it to them, even though we could have wished that they had postponed their request for a few weeks.

4. The report of the N.N.R.C. will probably contain material both pleasing and displeasing to the Communists. However, in their handling of the prisoner problem they did enable the U.N.C. to release the prisoners. In Assembly debate it should be possible for delegates of the 16 to emphasize those aspects of the conduct of the N.N.R.C. and the Indians which have been consistent with U.N.C. views. Those aspects of such conduct which have been inconsistent with these views need not prevent these delegates from supporting a resolution expressing appreciation for services performed by the Commission and India. A resolution of this nature may be acceptable to India.

5. Concerning possible Assembly discussion of the Geneva Conference on Korea, we do not attach too much importance to the dangers of possible Indian intervention. The only type of resolution which might commend itself to the Assembly would be a harmless one calling on both sides to get on with the conference.

6. While we think February 9 would be satisfactory as a date, we are willing to accept the United Kingdom proposal for February 16 if that is agreeable to India.

7. Please let the State Department know our views as outlined above.

8. We propose to request our Permanent Delegate in New York to inform other members of the group of 16 of these views.

(Communications: The following to be repeated to London only.)

9. Please let the appropriate U.K. authorities know how our thinking on this subject now stands.

KOREA — RECONVENING OF GENERAL ASSEMBLY

A. Situation at Present

1. After you had decided that Canada should concur in the Indian proposal that the Assembly be reconvened, Mr. Johnson received a report through the British that, according to the private speculations of Secretary-General Pillai, Mr. Nehru and Madame Pandit as a result of warnings of difficulties foreseen by friendly governments, including Canada, might "reconcile themselves to doing without an Assembly meeting altogether". Also, the State Department, when informed of our views, asked if we would delay the implementation of our decision for a day or two until the three Western Foreign Ministers had concluded discussions they were having on this subject in Berlin. On January 27 we informed Mr. Reid in New Delhi that for these reasons, we were delaying our concurrence in the Indian request but that we intended to go ahead with it on Thursday, January 28, if there was no new development on the Indian side.

2. I attach a copy of telegram No. 47 of January 27† from New Delhi in which Mr. Reid reports that according to information supplied to him on January 26 by Secretary-General Pillai, Mr. Nehru was not withdrawing the Indian request for the reconvening of the Assembly. However, Mr. Pillai's impression was that the Indian authorities were getting reconciled to the fact that the Assembly would not be meeting at this time. This information from Mr. Reid throws a rather different light on the report we received through the British, which had not indicated that Mr. Nehru would not withdraw the Indian request.

3. I also attach a copy of teletype No. 103 of January 27[†] from our High Commissioner in London, which explains that as a result of consultations between Mr. Dulles and Mr. Eden in Berlin, the United Kingdom has reached a firm decision to reply formally on January 28 that it does not consider it desirable for the Assembly to meet on February 9 because of "current developments".

B. Evaluation of Reasons Given by the British for Their Decision

4. The Western Foreign Ministers have indicated their opposition to any discussion in Berlin of Far Eastern problems. Their opposition might be more defensible if they could refer to the Korean problem as one with which the United Nations has long been seized — witness the Indian desire to report to the General Assembly on their activities with regard to unrepatriable prisoners of war.

5. Prospects for agreement being reached on a Five-Power Conference seem very slim. Nevertheless, as reported in London teletype No. 107 of January 27, a copy of which is attached, the main reason given by Mr. Lloyd for the British having reached their new position is their decision to support the idea of a Five-Power Conference with its agenda confined to Far Eastern questions, of which Korea would be the first item to be discussed. They have no commitment from the United States in support of a Five-Power Conference but, while they are exploring the implications and possibilities of this altered approach, they think it premature for the Assembly to convene.

6. You will recall exploring the possibility of a similar conference being convened concerning Korea on the understanding that the initiative should come from the lesser members of the group of 16, who would waive their rights to attend the conference under the relevant Assembly resolution. The new British attitude entails taking the Korean issue out of its United Nations context to which Canada has consistently attached importance; the abandonment of a Geneva Conference on Korea in the form envisaged by the General Assembly; and the shelving of India as a possible member of that Conference. It would seem that the implications and possibilities of the altered British approach will require much time to explore. Therefore, it is difficult to see that an Assembly, reconvening on February 9 and probably lasting no more than two weeks, could seriously complicate the self-assigned task of the United Kingdom. The British had decided not to oppose the Indian proposal but this was before Mr. Eden had talked with Mr. Dulles. Undoubtedly the Cabinet decision concerning the Five-Power Conference was also in the making before the two Foreign Ministers consulted. Possibly it stemmed from a desire to find a formula which would assist France to be extricated from its difficulties in Indochina. It is, therefore, difficult to escape the conclusion that the role of Mr. Dulles in the British volte face was large. In this connection you might wish to look back at CRO telegram Y No. 21 of January 22 a copy of which is attached, in which British moral arguments for not opposing an early meeting of the Assembly are outlined.

7. It is also interesting to note that the State Department reaction to the Canadian disposition to accept the Indian proposal as reported in Washington teletype WA-162 of January 27, a copy of which is attached, covers no new ground. It was a State Department representative who suggested to Mr. Johnson that some agreement in the matter of reconvening might be reached as a result of consultations among Messrs. Dulles, Eden and Bidault in Berlin.

C. Conclusions

8. The British reversal of decision will probably result in the Indians not getting the necessary majority for their proposal. The question then arises as to whether your decision concerning the reconvened Session should now be implemented. We think it should because, having warned the Indians of the difficulties which might be expected to confront them in a reconvened session, we still have some obligation to do our part towards giving them a hearing; because the impact on Indian and Asian opinion would be good; and because the arguments advanced by both the U.K. and the U.S. in favour of a contrary course do not, in our opinion, stand up.

9. If you agree, you might wish to consider the despatch of the attached draft teletype† to our Permanent Representative in New York (repeated to London, New Delhi and Washington) requesting him to inform the U.N. Secretary-General on Thursday, January 28, that we agree with the proposal made by the President concerning reconvening of the Assembly.

KOREA — RECONVENING OF GENERAL ASSEMBLY

1. Selwyn Lloyd has asked me to convey to you at once his gloss on the United Kingdom's right-about-face on the question of calling a General Assembly, which amplifies and explains their reasons for the reversal of position reported in our telegram under reference. The Foreign Secretary has been authorized by the Cabinet to support the idea of a Five-Power conference with its agenda confined to Far Eastern questions, of which Korea would be the first item to be discussed. While they are exploring the implications and possibilities of this altered approach, the United Kingdom concluded that it would be premature to have the Assembly reconvened on February 9 to discuss Korean questions. I asked Lloyd if they had secured any commitment from the Americans that they would entertain the idea of a Five-Power Far Eastern conference in return for the United Kingdom abandoning its argument for an early meeting of the Assembly. He said he did not think they had attempted to do so.

2. He insisted that this new political consideration had determined the United Kingdom's position on the expediency of reconvening the Assembly, and that for his part he did not attach comparable importance to the other points mentioned in the Foreign Office explanation reported in our telegram under reference.

KOREA — RECONVENING OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

(State Department Meeting of January 27).

It was agreed at the meeting that Dean should reply to the recent Communist letter about resumption of the Panmunjom talks by making clear his willingness to renew discussions and making the assumption that satisfactory arrangement for the clearing of the record was implicit in the Communist letter.

2. There was general support for the United States argument against an Assembly in the near future. We summarized the present Canadian view as given in EX-142 of January 26. We were alone in voicing these views and the Americans expressed some regret at the inability of the sixteen to reach unanimity on this point.

3. Dean threw out the suggestion, without pressing it, that perhaps the Canadian Government would consider the delaying of a formal answer on the meeting of the Assembly pending Communist reaction to Dean's proposed reply. We made no comment on this suggestion. It was recognized, however, that receipt of the Communist response by the deadline of January 29 was improbable.

4. We are sending a full report of the meeting by teletype tomorrow morning.

KOREA — RECONVENING THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Since we discussed this subject this morning, there have been three new developments which you may wish to consider.

(1) Telegram No. 56 of January 29† from New Delhi confirms our previous impression that Mr. Nehru would not be unduly disappointed if the Assembly is not reconvened;

(2) Mr. Menon, whom Mr. Johnson encountered last evening, expressed bitter views about our attitude and implied that the Indians would be very unhappily affected by the vote against them.

(3) The Swedes have decided to concur in the holding of the Assembly.

The difference between Menon's and Pillai's interpretation of the Indian attitude is probably due to a large extent to differences in their outlooks and temperaments. It is possible, however, that we may have read Mr. Reid's telegrams out of context. The last word he had from us indicated that we would concur in reconvening unless we had an indication that the Indians were changing their position. It is possible that, in his telegrams reporting Pillai's and Mr. Nehru's attitude, he has assumed that our decision to concur has been taken. There might well be a difference between the Indians reconciling themselves to a total negative vote which appears inevitable and their accepting with equanimity a Canadian vote in the negative.

Please deliver following message to Mr. Nehru from Mr. St-Laurent:

Quote. I am anxious that you should understand fully why we have today after very serious consideration and with much reluctance informed the Secretary-

General that we thought a session of the United Nations General Assembly would not be advisable at this time but might be considered at a later date.

2. We have been most anxious to meet your wishes in this matter because we sympathize entirely with your desire to report to the Assembly on the discharge of the difficult and thankless responsibilities which Indians have fulfilled so ably in the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission and in the Custodial Force. Your willingness, furthermore, to forego a reconvening of the Assembly early in January when we were discussing this matter before the Assembly completed its sessions in December has also, I recognize, placed an obligation upon us to accept your request for a date after January 22. We should have had no hesitation in accepting your request if it had not been for our growing fear that, for many reasons of which you are aware, a meeting of the Assembly at this time might serve to aggravate differences and to complicate the process of negotiations at Panmunjom rather than to promote harmonious solutions. It was for this reason that I asked our High Commissioner in New Delhi to explain to you frankly our doubts on this subject.

3. In the last few days there have been proposals at the Berlin Conference for discussions on Asian subjects, which may or may not prove acceptable, but which we think had perhaps better be explored before an Assembly session is reconvened. There have, as you know, also been indications that the discussions at Panmunjom might be resumed. It is true that none of these general matters need be discussed in the Assembly, which could have been limited to a discussion of the work of the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission, but we have been very doubtful and I think you yourself have recognized that a limited agenda of this kind would be very difficult to maintain.

4. It was with these many considerations in mind and in the belief that you would not misunderstand our motives that we have finally given our reply to the Secretary-General. I am very much looking forward to an opportunity during my forthcoming visit to India to talk with you further on this subject. Unquote.

5. For your own information we were prepared to concur in the Indian request for an Assembly if the Indians had pushed us harder. Your recent messages, however, and those received by the British indicating that the Indians themselves were not as strongly attached to the holding of an Assembly as we had previously believed, determined our final stand. Ends.

THE UNITED NATIONS

1. KOREA — POLITICAL CONFERENCE

Far Eastern Division: On February 18 at the conclusion of their meetings in Berlin, the Foreign Ministers of the United States, France, the United Kingdom and the Soviet Union announced in a communiqué that they had agreed that a conference of representatives of the Big Four, the Peking regime, the two Koreas and the other countries the armed forces of which participated in the Korean conflict and which desired to attend should meet in Geneva on April 26 to reach a peaceful settlement of the Korean question. They also agreed that the conference should discuss the problem of Indo-China, on which occasion in addition to representatives of the Big Four and of the Peking regime, other interested states would be invited.

On February 19 representatives of the 16 United Nations Governments concerned in Korea and of the Republic of Korea met in Washington to discuss this Berlin agreement. They raised no objection to the State Department view that in the present circumstances no action should be taken to reply to the Communist letter of January 26 demanding the return to Panmunjom of U.S. Emissary Dean to resume the talks preliminary to the Political Conference.

At the Washington meeting Mr. Dean said that the Berlin agreement constituted to a considerable degree acceptance of the major U.N. aims at Panmunjom. He pointed out that under the agreement the Soviet Union would be a full participant in the Conference and thus obligated by its decisions. Moreover, the form of Soviet attendance meant that the difficult question of the participation and designation of neutrals would not now arise.

Concerning procedures for the Conference, Mr. Murphy of the State Department said that this would require consultation at a later time. Mr. Dean said that Mr. Eden had expressed the opinion in Berlin that there would be no need for further preliminary talks with the Communists and that the Conference itself should deal with procedural matters. Our Ambassador in Washington, speaking personally, expressed the view that questions of facilities and expense were of secondary importance at this time and that the principal cause for satisfaction about the Berlin agreement was that it was within the framework of U.N. decisions.

Mr. Scott has reported from Seoul that, according to the U.S. Ambassador there, President Rhee, while disappointed at the Berlin agreement, will probably not boycott the Conference.

GENEVA CONFERENCE; CANADIAN PARTICIPATION

42. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that an invitation had been received for Canadian participation in the conference in Geneva on April 26th, being arranged by the United States, the United Kingdom, the U.S.S.R. and France, and to include the Chinese People's Republic. It seemed desirable that the smaller powers should not participate in the conference until towards its conclusion, but, if other middle powers were determined to participate, probably Canada would be obliged to do so.

43. The Cabinet noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and agreed that Canadian participation in the Geneva Conference be left to the discretion of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, after consultation with other potential participants apart from the five major powers concerned.⁵

We are a little worried that the United States, the United Kingdom and France might have in mind partially insulating lesser United Nations participants from Conference proceedings through some form of steering committee which would go far towards permitting these three powers to speak for our side as a whole. Such qualms stem from the following considerations:

(a) The Geneva Conference itself will come to pass because the United States, the United Kingdom and France reached a preliminary agreement concerning it at Berlin and then sold the idea to the Soviet Union;

(b) There are indications that the United States, the United Kingdom and France have, since the Bermuda Conference,⁶ been exchanging ideas concerning Korea and that of late these ideas have concerned procedural and substantive matters to be considered at Geneva.

(c) Since the concept of Communist China as the "Big Fifth" is anathema to the United States, the latter might be tempted to lay particular stress on the importance of the Big Four set-up and on our side, the Big Three;

(d) Since both Korea and Indochina will be discussed at Geneva and since on our side only the Big Three are likely to participate in discussions on both subjects, the idea of a steering committee composed of the Big Three may be advocated in the interests of procedural efficiency. This idea would probably have an appeal for the French since they are strongly conscious of the inter-relationship of the Korean and Indochinese problems.

2. We are aware that it would be preferable if the United Nations side at Geneva could speak if not with one voice at least harmoniously on Korea and are satisfied that the desired result could be suitably achieved through adequate consultation. We have long recognized the special position of the United States and, of course, of South Korea vis-à-vis the Korean problem, but such recognition does not entail our acceptance of any first- and second-class arrangements for United Nations members at the Geneva Conference. On the United Nations side the history of the Korean problem contains no special mention of a "big power" approach to it. For such approach to be developed now would increase the likelihood of friction among the countries on our side, most of which contributed forces as responsible United Nations members, not on the basis of their obligations as great or small powers. Nothing in the above comments should be interpreted as hostile criticism of the inviting powers making preliminary arrangements for the Conference. No other course is feasible.

3. It would of course be a rather delicate matter to raise this issue directly with the Foreign Office, but we would like to be re-assured that there is no such move on foot. I suggest you might approach the matter indirectly by enquiring at a fairly high level about how the United Kingdom authorities anticipate that the conference will be organized. You might suggest that since we have no direct interest in Indochina we do not expect to take an active part in this phase of the conference. On the other hand, as one of the major contributors to the United Nations effort in Korea

we would expect to take an active part in the sessions on Korea, and although not one of the inviting powers we would expect to participate on an equal basis with any other members of the conference. The main point is to make clear to the United Kingdom authorities that we would not be content with a second-class position, as would in fact be the case if anything like a steering committee of the Big Four were set up which would in fact operate as the effective conference. KOREA — POLITICAL CONFERENCE

1. I think your misgivings about the way in which the proceedings of the Korean conference may work out may prove to be pretty well grounded. It is likely to take some contrivance and goodwill on the part of our friends to prevent the conference organizing itself into inner and outer circles. In the circumstances I thought it would be just as well to tell Lord Reading, the Minister of State who will be Eden's second and successor at the Geneva conference, just what we were worried about so that the point could be kept consciously in mind in any pre-conference discussion of arrangements there may be between the United Kingdom and the inviting powers. Reading took the point quickly enough, but did not come up with any procedural suggestions that might help to meet it. He said they were a little behind-hand in their preparations for the conference and he had not yet had an opportunity of talking over such problems with Eden, but would see that the point I made was kept in mind.

2. One procedural point that seems to me to have a bearing on our problem is whether the conference will usually meet in open or closed session. The further one yields to the demand for open sessions the stronger will be the pressure for transacting the real business of the conference in bureaux or steering committees. Reading said that the United Kingdom would very much prefer closed sessions, and I should think it would be in our interest to support this position. (Incidentally, he mentioned that applications for accommodation in Geneva from newspapermen already totalled 1,500.)

3. Another complication which will have to be taken into account is that the Australian delegation will also be headed by its Foreign Minister, who I believe is planning to fly back from Geneva to take part in the final stages of a general election. On past form the Australians can be expected to push very hard for membership of any steering committee that may be set up. All things considered it seems to me that the best chance of preventing the situation outlined in your message coming to pass is to try to get the idea put about and accepted in advance of the conference that its business sessions must be secret; secondly, to try to apply the technique which I am told worked very successfully at the last NATO Ministerial Meeting of creating a de facto steering committee strictly limited to the heads of delegations.

GENEVA CONFERENCE — DISCUSSIONS ON KOREA

Following from the Acting Under-Secretary,⁷ Begins: I understand that the United States is now prepared to begin preliminary discussions concerning the Geneva Conference, and that you will be seeing State Department officials in the near future for this purpose. At this stage we do not wish to advance firm Canadian views. We have, however, set forth a number of talking points below with some indication of our thinking at the official level, which we hope you will find useful in eliciting State Department views on a number of subjects, and which may suggest to them some further avenues of exploration.

Objectives

2. There would appear to be general agreement on two basic objectives for the Geneva Conference. All parties on our side (with the exception of South Korea) agree that as a minimum we should ensure that the armistice is continued; at the same time we all agreed that the ultimate objective is the establishment of a unified, independent and democratic Korea in accordance with United Nations resolutions on the subject, and that negotiations should be directed towards the eventual achievement of this goal. Between the minimum acceptable and the final objective is the area for manoeuvre at Geneva.

3. The first stage of negotiations will presumably revolve around the ultimate objectives of unification and the withdrawal of foreign troops. In this connection we are pleased to note that State Department thinking at the "working level" is in general agreement with the United Kingdom draft plan for the unification of Korea. We are, of course, in full accord with the view that if elections and the establishment of an all-Korean government is agreed, that this should precede the withdrawal of foreign troops and that a unified Korea should be free to maintain such international security and economic relations consistent with the United Nations charter as it may find appropriate. Accordingly, we would not support any scheme for an "imposed neutralization" of Korea.

4. As the prospects of reaching agreement with the Communists for an over-all plan for the unification of Korea seem poor, we agree with the United Kingdom that it will be most desirable to explore some alternatives so that some agreements of a more limited character can be reached. A complete breakdown of the conference might thus be avoided, and the way might be left open for further negotiations at a later date. We are not convinced, however, that it would be a good idea at this stage to work out a detailed overall modus vivendi which would be advanced as a comprehensive second stage plan if and when deadlock is reached on discussions concerning unification procedures. Such an approach would almost certainly be regarded by the South Koreans as a betrayal of their cause, and would doubtless provoke strong criticism from other quarters. It might also enable the Chinese Communists to declare that peace, rather than just an armistice, had been established in Korea while holding firmly onto North Korea. During the discussions on unification, however, it might be possible to form a fairly accurate assessment of the sort of concessions which the Communists would be prepared to make. With this knowledge, and a flexible approach, it might be possible to work out in piecemeal fashion agreements on a number of points which would:

- (a) ensure the continuance of the armistice;
- (b) provide a basis for future resumption of negotiations;
- (c) continue United Nations interest in the Korean problem;
- (d) ease North-South relations in Korea wherever practical; and yet not give the appearance of accepting a half-settlement as good enough.

5. We would be interested in knowing what thought the State Department has given to the more limited objectives we have suggested above. We are inclined to think that a willingness to review in a practical way measures which would maintain the armistice and leave the way open for future negotiations would strengthen the United Nations side's position in respect to world public opinion.

Maintaining the Armistice

6. We think that the armistice agreement could usefully be examined prior to the conference so that its validity over a longer period can be assessed and necessary adjustments can be considered. In particular, we have the following points in mind:

(a) Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission. We understand that some United Nations Command officers are not satisfied with the way this body is now functioning, particularly in regard to the restrictions placed on its investigations in North Korea. We would be interested in knowing whether the State Department thinks that better scrutiny of the movement of personnel and goods into North Korea might be attained by means of some amendment to the Commission's terms of reference, and if so, whether they think it might be worthwhile to propose the necessary amendments at Geneva; or whether they feel that the best course is simply to take the retaliatory action of restricting the activities of the Commission in South Korea in the same way as the Communists have done in the north.

(b) Width of Demilitarized Zone. The United Kingdom has suggested a zone 20 miles wide. We are not convinced of the desirability of this, and feel that the present zone is wide enough. We would be interested in knowing what United States views on this point are.

(c) Method of Policing the Demilitarized Zone. We feel that some consideration might be given to the possibility of the establishment of a "neutral" police force, or at least the attachment of neutral representatives to the Joint Observer Teams in order to reduce the possibility of misunderstandings and incidents. If the United States likes this suggestion would it require an amendment of the Armistice Agreement or simply an agreed interpretation?

(d) Establishment of a Drawback Area for Foreign Troops as Suggested by the United Kingdom. We are doubtful about the feasibility of this proposal, and would be interested in knowing whether the State Department has given it any thought.

Political Liaison Arrangements

7. If the conference fails to make progress towards the unification of Korea the United Nations side will wish to indicate its willingness to resume discussions at any time. Provision might be made for this in a number of ways:

(a) An agreed statement to the effect that if either side had any fresh proposals to advance, discussions would be opened through normal diplomatic channels, and a further conference would be convened if necessary;

(b) an agreement could be made for political liaison of a type similar to that employed at Panmunjom when Mr. Dean was negotiating for a political conference;

(c) a subsidiary political body might be set up as an adjunct to the Military Armistice Commission with advisory, reportorial and "good offices" functions to facilitate political liaison;

(d) UNCURK might be converted into a liaison body if some arrangement for Communist representation on it could be worked out. This might have the disadvantage of giving the Chinese Communists an excuse to claim some status in the United Nations, and by the same token this arrangement might be regarded in other quarters as a form of concession to Communist Chinese claims for representation in the United Nations. The problem of a headquarters for UNCURK thus transformed would also be a difficult one.

We would be interested in State Department views on these ideas and the general question of political liaison arrangements.

United Nations Interest

8. As action to resist aggression in Korea was taken in the name of the United Nations, we wish to see the United Nations interest in Korea maintained. We would anticipate that at its next session the General Assembly would pass resolutions confirming any agreements reached at Geneva, and possibly review past resolutions. It seems likely that the possibility will be raised of rescinding some United Nations resolutions (e.g. the one branding Communist China and North Korea as aggressors and the one imposing trade controls) in return for certain concessions from the Communist side. Rescission would have to be made by the General Assembly itself, and the countries represented at Geneva would presumably not be able to do more than undertake to recommend rescission or maintenance of the resolution, as considered desirable. This matter would need very careful study. We would be interested in knowing whether the State Department expects any pressure to develop before the next meeting of the United Nations General Assembly for rescission of some United Nations resolutions, and how it plans to meet this pressure should it arise.

9. If the United Nations position in the picture is to be maintained, some consideration of the position of UNCURK would appear to be called for. We wonder how the State Department weighs the arguments for and against the suggestion that UNCURK be developed into a liaison body if some representation on it of the Communist side could be arranged.

10. In discussions on the unification of Korea we feel that it should be emphasized that a unified Korea must be economically as well as politically viable, and in this context the question of external economic aid to Korea is of some importance. The UNKRA organization is already established in Korea and it is highly desirable in our view to maintain the United Nations special interest in the country. We would be interested in knowing what consideration the State Department has given to the economic problems of a unified Korea, and whether any thought has been given to the future of UNKRA in this connection.

North-South Relations in Korea

11. If it should prove impossible to secure the unification of Korea on acceptable terms, it may be desirable to consider whether there are matters of North-South relations in Korea not adequately covered by the Armistice Agreement on which further practical arrangements could be made to tide over the period until further progress can be made toward unification. We suppose that most questions of North-South relations can be covered by the Armistice Agreement, but wonder whether the State Department is aware of any matters which are not covered and for which additional limited practical agreements could be usefully discussed at Geneva? For instance, is the question of exchange of mail between North and South covered by the Armistice Agreement? Is it possible for individuals on compassionate or other grounds to make return journeys across the line? What happens to fishing boats that blow North or South in a storm? Is there provision for at least local exchange of produce and goods for communities on or near the line? Perhaps there are other matters in this category that should be examined.

Tactics

12. We would be interested in United States views as to how delegations on the United Nations side should organize themselves at the conference, and what relationship between the Korean talks and the Indo-China talks is envisaged. We feel that the conference will afford an unusual opportunity to gain some knowledge of Sino-Soviet relations and to ascertain Chinese Communist views on general Far Eastern questions and we would be interested in knowing how far the State Department would be prepared to go in drawing out these views.

13. We would like to know whether the State Department has any firm views on how the United Nations should be kept informed of developments at the conference, as called for in the General Assembly resolution of August 28.⁸ Aside from this obligation, we feel that special attention should be given to informing non-participants — particularly India and the other interested Asian States — of the progress of the talks, and consideration might well be given to ascertaining their views on an informal basis from time to time. Such action might head off some criticism from being voiced at the May 4 Colombo meeting of South Asian Prime Ministers who may be expected to resent exclusion from the discussion of Asian problems. We feel that no effort should be spared to see that the United Nations case is understood and appreciated in countries which will not be represented at Geneva.

KOREA — GENEVA CONFERENCE

The teletype exchange under reference lends weight to our concern lest the United Kingdom, the United States and France should so organize the conference that they will serve as the effective negotiators for United Nations members participating on our side. Since the continued failure of the State Department to shift into high gear the Korea consultative machinery in Washington, though understandable, may be expected to strengthen progressively the tendency of the Big Three to run our side of the conference, some action on our part seems desirable, lest our apparent inertia contribute to this trend.

2. I am impressed by Mr. Robertson's two suggestions as to how the developing situation may be righted, i.e. (a) to have the conference conduct its business sessions in secret, and (b) to have a de facto steering committee strictly limited to the heads of delegations.

⁸ Voir/See Volume 19, Documents 156, 157.

3. I should be grateful if you would approach the State Department informally at a fairly high level and make clear to them our assumption that in conference sessions on Korea we expect to participate on an equal basis with any other member of the conference and that, although we hope that there will be the closest collaboration and team spirit among the democratic participants, we do not envisage the conference as a meeting between two sides, with our side expressing its uniform view through one of the Great Powers as spokesman. You might also put forward the suggestions concerning conference secrecy and a steering committee. As for secret sessions, I recognize that there may be a good number of domestic pressures on Mr. Dulles to keep the negotiations in the public realm, but I would hope that these can be resisted.

4. If you think desirable you might try out Mr. Robertson's suggestions on representatives of other lesser governments which will be participating with us at Geneva, and inform us of their reactions. We have already mentioned our uneasiness to Australian and New Zealand representatives here.

KOREA — GENEVA CONFERENCE

We brought to the attention of Alexis Johnson today the question raised in your messages EX-487 of March 30 and EX-551 of April 5. Johnson heads the State Department Geneva conference "team". He said he was appreciative of the point of principle involved, which he would keep very much in mind, together with your suggestions regarding secret sessions and a steering committee limited to the heads of delegations. It was clear from Johnson's remarks that the State Department have not come to any decision on how our side of the conference should operate. Johnson, who observed that so far he has not even discussed the matter of any sort of steering committee, said that he would be glad to continue to receive from us any views or suggestions which we might care to give.

2. He expressed the opinion that, after the opening general round of speeches at Geneva, there would have to be some sort of planning and organization on our side, so that orderly and effective presentations of our points of view and rebuttals to the Communists could be given. He assured us that the United States would wish to see during the Geneva conference the same sort of close consultation with Commonwealth countries which had been carried out through the armistice negotiations.

There would of course be the usual difficulty in that the consultations with all the sixteen governments would have a lack of security, while inner circle consultations would arouse resentment.

3. Johnson said that the Berlin conference was a model operation and he hoped that the Geneva conference might be conducted on somewhat similar lines, although its unwieldiness would make this much more difficult. He thought that many decisions as to co-operation on the allied side would have to be made by heads of delegations on the spot.

4. The departmental views contained in EX-528 and EX-529 of April 2 have been communicated informally to the State Department as an "oral message". They have also been conveyed to other Commonwealth Embassies concerned.

5. Johnson said that the ROK Government has still not replied to its invitation to participate in the conference. He was not unduly concerned and expressed the personal opinion that ROK acceptance would probably come along soon. He said that the United States has informed the ROK Government that, because of the time element, it has had to commence consultations with other friendly governments, although it had wished to do so with the Korean Government first. He thought this might hasten the Korean reply.

Yesterday the Australian and New Zealand ambassadors and myself and the British Minister were requested to go to the State Department to receive a paper outlining United States views on the proposals for reunification of Korea with which the allied side might begin the Geneva conference. Walter Robertson and Alexis Johnson spoke for the State Department. The text of the paper, which was described as meant to provide a basis for consultations with friendly governments, is contained in my immediately following teletype.

2. The Commonwealth representatives questioned the wisdom of stating as one of the general objectives the emergence from the conference with a moral and propaganda victory, on the grounds that this gave the impression that serious negotiations were not expected. Robertson agreed that this objective had been overstated and badly worded.

3. There was also some questioning, chiefly by Spender, about the emphasis on the necessity to preserve the integrity of the ROK Government. Robertson and Johnson, particularly the latter, argued vigorously for this position on the grounds both of principle (in accordance with United Nations resolutions) and tactics with regard both to the Communists and the ROK. They expressed the view that in any case the ROK could not be carried into the conference on anything less.

4. There was a confused discussion about whether the State Department paper set forth an extreme position which would be susceptible to modification by negotiation. The State Department officials seemed reluctant to state this positively but that it is so seems apparent both from its general character and from certain statements in it, e.g.:

(b)1 "We believe we should seek allied agreement to begin the Geneva conference with proposals for resuming the United Nations plans for unification of Korea which the Communists frustrated by political opposition and aggression."

(c)2 "They (ROK) would not understand starting the conference with proposals to do away with the ROK . . . if we go to the ROK first with the above position, it will give us a better argument to persuade the ROK to accept more generalized forms for accomplishing their objective — Korea's unification."

(c)4 "It is tactically dangerous to begin our consultations or start off at the conference . . . with a final, fixed, rigid formula. We do not wish to be traded out by concessions before the conference begins."

(c)6 "If the ROK and North Koreans each present positions, then the set-up and atmosphere will be created for the allied side to favour at a latter stage in the conference some modified position commanding ROK, allied and world-wide support."

(CF. WA-529 of March 30.)†

5. The State Department would like to have your views on their paper on the reunification of Korea. Robertson and Johnson indicated that they would probably open consultations with the ROK Government on this matter soon whether or not the ROK has replied to its invitation to attend the Geneva conference.

KOREA — GENEVA CONFERENCE

Following is the text of the State Department paper on the reunification of Korea, Begins:

UNITED STATES VIEWS ON REUNIFICATION OF KOREA

A. General Objectives on Korea

In general the United States and the Commonwealth agree on our substantive objectives:

1. to obtain agreement from the Communists on establishing an independent and united Korea;
2. to withdraw foreign forces from Korea with adequate safeguards and in connection with the unification of Korea;
3. to maintain a strong united allied and United Nations position and frustrate Communists attempts to divide us;
4. to emerge from the conference with a moral and propaganda victory, placing the onus of failure squarely on the Communists; and
5. to take only such positions at Geneva which will help maintain a position of political and military strength for United Nations forces in Korea, including the ROK.

B. Specific Proposals

1. Fulfilment of United Nations Resolutions. We believe we should seek allied agreement to begin the Geneva conference with proposals for resuming the United Nations plans for unification of Korea which the Communists frustrated by political opposition and aggression. We have in mind specifically the assembly resolutions of November 14, 1947, October 7, 1950 and December 1, 1950, and August 28, 1953. The principal points of these resolutions are:

(a) The United Nations has frequently attempted to assist the Korean people in re-establishing their freedom, independence and unity which are the urgent and rightful claims and that the Korean question is primarily a matter for the Korea people.

(b) National independence of Korea should be reestablished and foreign forces withdrawn thereafter.

(c) Elections should be held on the basis of adult suffrage and by secret ballot and the number of representatives from the voting districts should be proportionate to population; elections should be observed by an international commission with freedom to observe and consult throughout Korea.

(d) The ROK is the only lawful sovereign government in Korea insofar as the United Nations is concerned.

(e) The United Nations has in being a commission with personnel and experience to carry out the terms of reference on Korean unification established in the General Assembly resolution of October 7, 1950.

(f) The United Nations has in being an agency to rehabilitate all Korea once it is unified.

2. In order to preserve the legitimacy, sovereignty and integrity of the ROK, the United States would prefer proposals along the above lines. This would bring about the integration of North Korea under the ROK through elections either only in the north or simultaneously throughout Korea under United Nations supervision. Such arrangements would safeguard our security requirements in Korea. If such a proposal were worked out it would be combined with phased withdrawal of foreign forces staged before and after elections and the establishment of a single national government of Korea.

3. The Communists undoubtedly will reject and denounce such a proposal. However, it would appear to the world at large more favourable to Korean interests than the Communist plan because it would:

(a) preserve the integrity of the nation and people which fought, with much allied and United Nations blood and treasure, for three years against Communist aggressors;

(b) resume the interrupted efforts of the United Nations since 1947 in good faith to establish the independence and unity of Korea;

(c) give voice to the viewpoint of the overwhelming majority of the Korean people; and

(d) not put the ROK on a par with the North Korean regime.

4. The situation in Korea is substantially different from that in Germany so that the parallel for the Eden plan for Germany should not be rigidly applied as a precedent for Korea. The Republic of Korea is a fully sovereign government; the West German Republic is not. The three allies are responsible for working out plans for the unification of Germany, and still retain certain powers over and above the West German Republic. The Republic of Korea in the last analysis will determine whether or not any plan on the unification of Korea is workable in its area of jurisdiction; it alone is responsible to the people of South Korea.

C. General Tactical Considerations

1. As a practical matter, no agreement at Geneva will be valid without the joint endorsement of the United States and the Republic of Korea. The United States has a moral obligation to go as far as possible in supporting ROK views and ROK claims to leadership in Korea.

2. In view of the position and size of our forces now in Korea and the need for support from the ROK population, we favor maintaining the integrity of the ROK in principle. In view of the casualties the American people sustained to defend the ROK, they would not understand starting the conference with proposals to do away with the ROK. The ROK will not accept the Commonwealth position, as such. If we go to the ROK first with the above position, it will give us a better argument to persuade the ROK to accept more generalized forms for accomplishing their objective — Korea's unification.

3. In order to maintain the United Nations aspect in bringing about Korean independence, the above plan would uphold and not ignore, or compromise, the succession of United Nations resolutions and efforts to unify Korea, which are still on the books.

4. It is tactically dangerous to begin our consultations or start off at the conference in substance with a final fixed, rigid formula. We do not wish to be traded out by concessions before the conference begins.

5. The above plan has the advantage of establishing the broad framework and context for seeking Korea's unity and independence. It keeps away from specifics such as elections, constitutions, and variant forms of agreement.

6. If the ROK and the North Koreans each presents positions, then the set-up and atmosphere will be created for the allied side to favor at a later stage in the conference some modified position commanding ROK, allied and world-wide support.

7. The Communists may attempt to link their proposals in Korea and Indochina. The generalized plan for Korea might serve as a precedent for a similar Communist plan for Indochina which would be unacceptable to Vietnam and France and the other allies.

D. The Second Stage Plans or Modus Vivendi

1. At this stage, the United States Government strongly feels that it is undesirable and dangerous and unwise to anticipate seeking extensive compromises with the Communists after the failure to reach agreement on unification. We should maintain a firm effort to achieve that objective by acceptable means. Only in that way is there any chance of ever reaching it and not diluting or compromising our efforts. Furthermore, the ROK will denounce any plans implying or providing for the partition of Korea or freezing the status quo. The ROK will accuse us of the "sell-out" they now fear may take place. Discussion of this matter is sensitive because if it were divulged, it would probably provoke a ROK walkout or stay home and would tip our hand to the Communists. The armistice agreement does provide a modus vivendi which we believe we could live with. Ends.

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 99-54

Ottawa, April 14, 1954

GENERAL INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE GENEVA CONFERENCE

I submit for the approval of Cabinet general instructions for the Canadian delegation to the political conference scheduled to convene on April 26 in Geneva.

This conference is the result of an agreement reached on February 18, 1954, at Berlin among the foreign ministers of the United States, the United Kingdom, France and the U.S.S.R. It will have on its agenda the Korean and Indo-China problems. Canada, as a contributor of armed forces to the Korean conflict, has been invited to participate in the consideration of the Korean question only.

While both the Communists and the United Nations are agreed that Korea should be unified and foreign troops withdrawn from its territory, neither side having lost the war can be expected to approve any scheme by which such goals might be achieved to its evident disadvantage. On our side the United States Government, limited by strong Congressional pressures and by positions taken publicly on a number of Far Eastern issues concerning which there might have been bargaining at Geneva, will probably approach the conference with very little flexibility. Furthermore, the South Korean government will not be bound by decisions of the Conference which it does not accept. On the other side the Communists cannot be expected to surrender control of North Korea at the conference table which we did not wrest from them on the battlefield. Although the chances that the conference will produce a lasting solution to the Korean problem are slight, the Canadian delegation, in close consultation with other friendly delegations, will seek to exploit any opportunity for easing tensions within the general limits set out below.

I. KOREA

1. General Objectives

The long term objective of the United Nations in Korea is the establishment of a unified, independent and democratic Korea. The delegation should support proposals directed towards the achievement of this end and in accordance with United Nations General Assembly resolutions on the subject. With regard to procedure, the delegation should support the view that if free elections and the establishment of an all-Korea government is agreed, this should precede the withdrawal of foreign troops.

2. Secondary Objectives if Agreement Cannot be Reached on Unification and Withdrawal of Foreign Troops

(a) As a minimum objective of the conference the delegation should consider supporting any reasonable measure which will ensure that the armistice is continued.

(b) If the conference fails to make progress towards unification of Korea it will be desirable for the United Nations side to indicate its willingness to resume discussions at any time. The delegation should accordingly support proposals which will provide a suitable means for reopening negotiations at a future date.

(c) The delegation should support any practical proposals of a limited nature which will serve to ease tensions in Korea and facilitate the continuance of the armistice, either through amendment of the Armistice Agreement of July 27, 1953, or the negotiation of supplementary agreements. In this connection the desirability of reducing Canada's military commitment in Korea should be borne constantly in mind.

(d) The delegation should support efforts to ensure that any agreement on Korea reached at Geneva, whether of a permanent or temporary character, is kept within a United Nations frame of reference and that any continuing arrangements take due account of past resolutions of the United Nations General Assembly.

II. INDO-CHINA

Canada had not been invited to take part in the discussions on Indo-China. An invitation has not been sought, but should be accepted in the unlikely event of it being extended. It is also possible that broader issues may be raised in these conversations on which the direct participants may find it desirable to consult with other delegations attending the Geneva Conference. The delegation should be prepared to take part in such consultations.

III. OTHER MATTERS

1. Recognition of Communist China and the Admission of Communist China to the United Nations

Since the Berlin communiqué stated that neither the invitation to, nor the holding of, the Geneva Conference should be deemed to imply diplomatic recognition in any case where it has not already been accorded, it is not expected that this will be a subject of negotiation at Geneva. If, however, the negotiations reach a point where the Communists state that United Nations proposals for the unification of Korea would be accepted by them if the governments represented at Geneva were to agree to support the seating of Communist China in the United Nations, the delegation should seek instructions from Ottawa so that, if possible, Cabinet may be consulted.

2. Reduction of United Nations Forces in Korea

If, in the light of the anticipated post-conference situation in Korea, some reduction of the United Nations forces in Korea seems feasible, the delegation should be prepared to explore with the United States, Commonwealth and other delegations the general considerations which would govern such reduction.

3. Canadians Detained in China

The delegation should take advantage of any opportunity for informal discussions with the Communist Chinese delegation concerning the question of Canadians detained in mainland China.

4. Relaxation of Trade Restrictions

Canadian restrictions on trade with Communist China and North Korea stem from a United Nations General Assembly resolution of 1951.⁹ It is quite possible that the Chinese Communists may exert considerable pressure at Geneva to have trade restrictions removed. The delegation should consult with delegations of other countries represented in the Paris Consultative Group on this matter should it be raised, bearing in mind that countries represented at Geneva can, in any event, make no commitment other than to recommend to the next meeting of the General Assembly that the above-mentioned United Nations resolution be rescinded.¹⁰

KOREA — GENEVA CONFERENCE

Alexis Johnson gave an oral exposition, at the meeting of Heads of Mission at the State Department yesterday, on the United States view of the position which should be taken at Geneva on the question of re-unification of Korea. He emphasized that the integrity of the United Nations actions in Korea should be maintained by the preservation of the State of the Republic, to which the puppet North Korean régime should not be regarded as an equal. He explained that by preservation of the Republican Government he did not mean preservation of governing personnel but the continuance of the forms of government which had been established by the United Nations. He said that, if the ROK were unanimous about anything, apart from desire for unification, it was their fear that they would be "sold down the river" by their allies. This was a factor which could not be ignored. The United States would consider politically and militarily dangerous any move which seriously threatened the structure or morale of the ROK Government.

2. Johnson then outlined the United States position, as given in the working paper transmitted with WA-612 (this paper was not distributed to the meeting).

3. He concluded by observing that, generally speaking, two proposals had been offered for re-unification:

(1) To promote a plan within the framework of the presently constituted Republican State;

(2) To start anew through an election of a constituent Assembly and the establishment of a new constitution.

The United States considered the approach in the first to be essential and was not in favour of the second alternative.

4. Scott of the British Embassy said that his government thought the United States position could be taken as a reasonable basis for discussion. He stressed, however, the need for flexibility. I pressed Johnson on the flexibility point and asked him whether my understanding was correct that, from the United States point of view, the negotiating area might be between the following two limits:

(a) Elections in the North to fill up the present Assembly, and

(b) all-Korea elections for a National Assembly with the forms of the present constitution of the Republic preserved.

Johnson replied in the affirmative.

5. I asked Johnson about the probable ROK position on the unification question. He replied that, from past statements, they might be expected to maintain that the following steps should be taken in the order given:

- (1) Complete withdrawal of the Chinese forces;
- (2) Extension of the ROK administration into North Korea;
- (3) Holding of elections in North Korea to fill the vacant assembly seats.

6. Johnson expressed the opinion that there would be some time for consultations amongst the allies even after the opening of the Geneva Conference. Business sessions would be unlikely to begin until a week or ten days after the opening. He said that he intended to recommend to the Secretary of State that he should get together with heads of allied delegations before the opening of the Conference.

KOREA — GENEVA CONFERENCE

Generally we have the impression that the State Department are putting down a first statement of a unification proposal which would not only be acceptable to the ROK but could be advanced by the latter as their own. Although the paper recognizes that its specific proposals will be unacceptable to the Communists, you have pointed out in your teletype WA-611 of April 8 that there are indications in the paper that the position adopted could be susceptible to modification by negotiation. Since the lines along which modification of the position might develop are not made clear, we should like to know more about the United States views concerning stages, beyond the one outlined, to which the negotiations might progress.

2. The paper makes clear the opinion that if the attempt to achieve unification should fail, the seeking of the extensive compromises necessary for a modus vivendi should not be anticipated at this stage. However, we should like to know whether the paper is considered to outline proposals for unification which in fact would be put forward by the ROK Government and thus set the stage for the situation envisaged in the paper's paragraph C6. If so, the further point arises of whether the initial assumption by the ROK Government of a relatively inflexible position might not affect adversely the manoeuvrability of the United States and other countries on our side. Moreover, this paragraph as it now stands seems inconsistent with the statement in paragraph C1 that "the United States has a moral obligation to go as far as possible in supporting ROK views . . .".

3. Perhaps the most evident differences in emphasis between the United States working paper and our own approach are the provisions to protect the position of the ROK Government throughout the processes of unification. We recognize that the ROK Government will only be bound by decisions of the Geneva Conference to which it adheres. We also recognize the special experience and responsibilities of the United States Government in dealing with the ROK Government. We certainly do not want to put forward proposals that would needlessly undermine the ROK Government. Nevertheless, if there is to be unification, the present ROK Government cannot just absorb North Korea but must eventually submerge its present identity in the greater Korea. Some risks to the positions of individual incumbents may be involved, but we think should be taken in the interests of achieving unification. We would hope that the United States Government would take the lead in persuading the ROK Government to accept proposals which are reasonable and to recognize the position of inter-dependency which it and associated states occupy vis-à-vis the Korean problem. The United States Government has played this role on occasions in the past in the interests of all those states concerned with the United Nations effort in Korea, including the ROK.

4. Turning to the particulars of the paper, we would comment first on the list of general objectives, with all but two of which we fully agree. Concerning paragraph A4, we concur in the criticism of the propaganda victory reported in your WA-611. We remain convinced that any propaganda victory arising out of the conference should be a by-product and not an objective of that conference.

5. As for paragraph A5, our approval is qualified. While we would not needlessly work against the ROK Government and believe strongly that any proposal for unification should not be put forward in a way liable to antagonize that Government, we cannot give assurances that we would not take a position which might appear to some ROK officials as undercutting their political strength.

6. The proposals contained in paragraph B1 seem to be based on an interpretation of the relevant provisions of various Assembly resolutions. We wonder if it would not be better tactics to adopt a position that these provisions speak for themselves on the various points necessary for a Korean settlement and that it is up to the Communists to establish that any plan which they put forward is more reasonable and morally defensible than that which would stem from such provisions. If, instead of having the ROK Government put forward proposals which in effect would provide for the absorption of North Korea, we were to pursue the latter course without berating the other side for failure to accept the resolutions previously, most of the general tactical considerations listed in the working paper would be taken into account. Moreover, this course would have the added advantage of not committing us to an inflexible stand on which the Communists might conceivably wreck the conference, the while successfully assessing us with responsibility in neutral Asia, or from which we would eventually have to retreat with losses.

7. We question the paper's proposal for elections — paragraph B2. We favor all-Korean elections and would hope that the United States Government would see fit to request the ROK Government to postpone the elections scheduled for next May until the outcome of the Geneva Conference is known. We think such postponement a prerequisite to any agreement concerning elections which might be reached with the Communists. President Rhee has given some indication that he is not averse to all-Korean elections, even for his own office. We would find it difficult to support any proposal for elections in the north only as a prerequisite to a united Korea.

8. We would want general elections under assured conditions but do not see the necessity of insisting that UNCURK as now composed should serve as part of the assurance machinery when another form of supervisory body might work just as satisfactorily but be less objectionable to the other side. The ROK electoral law, which provides for universal adult suffrage and secret ballot, is in harmony with democratic principles and has the general approval of UNCURK. We see the position of the ROK Government so secure in territory where two-thirds of the Koreans live that they need have no fear of accepting suggestions for minor safeguards in the application of the law to meet reasonable requests of the other side. Perhaps even the Communists might be permitted to campaign below the parallel if a similar concession is made in the north to ROK Government parties. Through the general elections the people might choose (a) a president, (b) a constituent assembly, and (c) whether they wish such assembly to adopt the constitutional laws of South Korea, of North Korea, or to conduct its own review of them. We suggest that some such scheme for elections would neither be repugnant to world opinion nor reasonably be regarded by Syngman Rhee as a threat to his power.

9. In paragraph C2 of the paper, reference is made to a "Commonwealth position". We hope that the use of this phrase does not indicate a United States assumption that a common "Commonwealth position" has in fact been agreed upon. If you think there is any misunderstanding in this regard, I should be grateful if you would correct the misapprehension. The United Kingdom draft plan given us in your WA-423† is skeletal and cannot be regarded as a "Commonwealth position". Our EX-528 only stated preliminary Canadian views at the official level.

KOREA — GENEVA CONFERENCE

The State Department, through Kenneth Young, have given us comments on the views and suggestions contained in your message EX-528 of April 2.

Objectives

2. The Department would increase the emphasis on serious negotiations for unification and withdrawal of troops and lessen that on working out a plan for some other sort of secondary agreement, if the main one cannot be achieved. They agree, however, that in the latter case it would at least be desirable to ensure the continuance of the armistice.

3. In the negotiations at Geneva the United States wishes to link the objectives of unification and withdrawal of foreign forces. The Communists will presumably seek to deal with the withdrawal of foreign forces as a first item. Young recalled the proposals for a political conference agenda which they submitted in writing at Panmunjom on November 30, which were: (a) the prisoners-of-war question; (b) withdrawal of foreign forces; (c) peaceful settlement of the Korean question and other related matters. The United States believes that withdrawal of forces should be based on performance and accompanied by safeguards. They are thinking of a phased and synchronized plan for unification and withdrawal. Withdrawal might be commenced before the holding of elections but it would not be completed until after unification. The ROK make out a strong case that the Chinese should get out of the country first. This is unrealistic, but commencement of withdrawal before the elections might present a symbolic affirmation of good faith by both sides.

4. The State Department agree with your opposition to imposed neutralization. They are considering what would be the most suitable instrument of guarantee to the security and political independence of a unified Korea. A plan under review is to incorporate a section dealing with this matter in an overall agreement on unification and withdrawal of forces. This would involve all participants in the conference, although without specific commitment, rather than a separate great power guarantee.

5. The State Department agree that chances for achieving settlement on the unification and withdrawal questions are slender. Nevertheless, they are very leery at this time about considering an alternative plan for some lesser or second-stage agreement. They consider this dangerous from the point of view of the attitude of the ROK and they are not in favour of doing anything which might give a sense of legality or permanence to the division of Korea. They say that consideration of what is to be done if the main negotiations at Geneva fail must be approached with extreme care because of the strong ROK sensitivity in this regard. For this reason, and because of the possible effects which any agreements worked out on Korea might have on the Indo-China problem, the State Department prefer not to discuss the details of a second-stage plan but to keep it in mind for later consideration in the light of developments at Geneva.

Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission

6. The Department consider your reference to the unsatisfactory functioning of the Commission to be an understatement. The United States believes that the terms of reference of the Commission have been deliberately circumvented by the Communists. Swiss and Swedish Embassy representatives called upon the State Department yesterday to express doubt that their members could under present circumstances carry out their proper functions of observing the movement of men and material into North Korea. The United States Government will probably bring this situation to the attention of governments concerned and to the public in some detail. The method of doing this has not yet been decided. The Department point out that the frustration of the N.N.S.C. is fundamental to the understanding of what an agreement with Communist countries means. The Department have not worked out proposals for renovating the N.N.S.C. or of possible future relations with UNCURK; they prefer to wait to see how things go at Geneva with regard to unification.

Width of Demilitarized Zone

7. They do not regard with favour the British suggestion of a twenty-mile zone because it would: (a) impinge on the United Nations defence positions; (b) press the Allied forces closer to Seoul; (c) take arable land out of cultivation.

Method of Policing Demilitarized Zone

8. Establishment of a neutral police force would be administratively difficult but will be examined. The joint observer teams have not worked out well in practice. It might be preferable to form neutral teams with freedom of movement on either side of the line of demarcation.

Establishment of Drawback Area for Foreign Troops

9. The State Department do not view this suggestion favourably.

Political Liaison Arrangements

10. The State Department believe that these suggestions should be examined at a later stage but they express reserve about them.

United Nations Interest

11. The State Department agree with the principle of inherent United Nations interest in Geneva. They believe that the Secretary-General should be kept informed but not through attendance of his representative as an observer, which might establish an undesirable precedent. They suggest that specific arrangements might be made for information to be passed either directly to the Secretary-General or to a representative designated by him in Europe. The position of UNCURK should be considered in the light of developments at Geneva.

North-South Relations in Korea

12. The State Department say that this is an extremely touchy subject. They believe it is one which is best left to be worked out between the Koreans themselves. We should be ready to assist but we should not take the initiative, which would be like "backing into a blow-torch".

Tactics

13. There has apparently been little advance beyond the nebulous situation outlined in our WA-607 of April 7. The difficulty is how the unwieldy Allied side should be organized efficiently so as not to be at a disadvantage with the Communists. Young said that the State Department and the Secretary of State were fully aware of the delicacy of the matter and the danger of ruffling people's feelings. There is a possibility that some of the smaller delegations may not wish to take a very active part in the conference.

KOREA — GENEVA CONFERENCE

The views contained in your message EX-620 of April 15, were conveyed to the State Department yesterday in the form of a written "oral message". They were given to Kenneth Young in the absence of Alexis Johnson, who was in Atlanta conferring with the President and Secretary of State prior to his departure for Geneva. Arthur Dean, who was in Young's office at the time and who has been giving advice to the State Department on the Korean conference, joined in the discussion of the Canadian views. Young expressed appreciation for the Canadian suggestions, which he said were helpful.

2. Some of the points made in your message EX-620 have been covered in our messages WA-656 of April 14, 667 of April 15, and 675 of April 17.† You will have seen from Para. 5 of WA-656 that the State Department regard their working paper as going a little further in the way of concessions than the ROK would wish, since the latter might be expected to press for withdrawal of Chinese forces first, followed by extension of the ROK administration into the North. Nevertheless, the Americans constantly stress the importance of going into the ROK and that it is essential not to frighten Rhee off at the outset. That is why the State Department do not wish at this time to go further, in indicating possible modifications of their position, than the statement of Alexis Johnson that the negotiating area might be between the limits of

(a) Elections in the North to fill up the present Assembly, and

(b) All-Korea elections for a National Assembly with the forms of the present constitution of the Republic preserved.

You will recall that Bedell Smith emphasized to me that the initial proposal to the Communists should adhere closely to the United Nations Resolutions and at the outset extend only to elections in the North.

Young, in confirming ROK acceptance of the invitation to attend the Geneva conference, told us that the United States had not yet consulted with the ROK about the substantive matters of the conference. With regard to assurances given to President Rhee by the United States Government, he characterized as misleading the article in the New York Times of April 19, which reported the Korean Ambassador Yang, as saying that the United States had undertaken greatly to increase Korean military power. Young said that Rhee had demanded equipment for a large number of additional Korean divisions but the United States had agreed only to send some further equipment to fill out the ROK's present twenty divisions. This undertaking and the promise to consult with the ROK if, after ninety days, no progress is being made at Geneva, represent, we understand, the only assurances given to Rhee on the eve of the conference.

4. The State Department agree with you that the present ROK Government cannot just absorb North Korea, if by "government" is meant the present "administration". What they are concerned to preserve is the constitutional form of the ROK Government, and their understanding is that your view is similar.

5. Young appeared interested in the arguments contained in Para. 6 of EX-620 regarding tactics. Dean also commented on this aspect. They both appeared to agree that, although the allied position should be based firmly on the United Nations resolutions, it should not be marked by complete inflexibility. Dean in fact said it should be as reasonable as possible consonant with the necessity of keeping the ROK in the conference.

6. Neither Young nor Dean seemed to believe that it would be practicable to ask the ROK Government to postpone its elections. They thought that such a request would have a very adverse effect upon Rhee's attitude towards the conference and there would also be constitutional difficulties. Nevertheless, Young thought that the suggestion for postponing elections might be made to the ROK if there were progress at Geneva towards the solution of the Korean question. The State Department are giving close study to the elections question from all points of view.

7. We made orally the point about a "Commonwealth position" referred to in Para. 9 of EX-620. Young replied that there was no misunderstanding of the situation. The phrase had been used rather carelessly in the State Department working draft because of certain assumptions which had been made about the views of Commonwealth countries.

8. Young said that a real difficulty had arisen in the discussions between the American, British, French and Russian technical liaison officers in Geneva. Consideration of the seating plan was not promising because the Soviet representative maintained that his instructions would not allow him to discuss the seating of the nineteen powers, but only that of a "big five".

9. The Secretary of State met at noon today with the Ambassadors of the sixteen powers and of the Associated States of Indo-China, in order to have a general discussion with them on the eve of his departure for Geneva about the Korean and Indo-China conferences and about the security of South-East Asia. This discussion will be reported in following messages. Some of the points made by Mr. Dulles with regard to the Korea conference also have a bearing on your message EX-620.

Today the Secretary of State met with the diplomatic representatives of "the sixteen" powers and of the Associated States of Indo-China. He discussed in general terms the Korean and Indo-China conferences and his proposals for the security of South-East Asia. These topics will be reported in separate messages,† this teletype being confined to his remarks about the Korean conference.

2. He began by referring to the complications of the Geneva conference as compared to the recent Berlin discussions. He was disturbed by the endeavours of the Russians to give it the aspect of a big five meeting, with other participating powers in a subordinate capacity. This objective on the part of the Soviet Union was reflected in the Russian suggestions for the operation of the conference. Dulles took a serious view of this attempt to subvert the Berlin agreement. He recalled that the issue had been fought out in Berlin and that specific Soviet concurrence in abandonment of the big five idea was contained in the Berlin communiqué. If this was now going to be questioned by the Soviet Union, it raised the fundamental issue of the value of trying to reach any agreement with the Communists. Dulles said that, subject to the important doubt being allayed, he thought that it should be possible to work out practical arrangements for the conference, since he believed that the Communists wished it to proceed. Another important outstanding matter was the Chairmanship. Dulles suggested that perhaps a national of some neutral country such as Switzerland might be invited to preside, or Hammarskjöld in a personal capacity. Dulles said he regarded it as important that he should make quick contact with the heads of friendly delegations in Geneva, in order to arrange for high level discussions with the Russians at Geneva on procedural questions. He surmised that this would be the only way of bringing the Russians to agreement within a short time.

3. Turning to substantive matters, the Secretary of State said he was happy to have been informed that the ROK would participate in the conference, since it was difficult to conceive of an effective conference without Korean attendance. He expressed the hope that the ROK delegation would take an active and leading part in the presentation of their case, in which they were the party primarily concerned as the only lawful government recognized by the United Nations side and representing 75 percent to 80 percent of the Korean population. He said he understood that the Korean delegation was proceeding directly to Geneva. He did not know their intentions but he thought it would be appropriate for the Korean delegation to make the opening presentation on the allied side when substantive matters came to be discussed. The Korean representative said that the ROK delegation expected to be in Geneva on April 24. Dulles said it would be important for heads of the allied delegations to exchange views at Geneva as soon as possible.

4. He said that he had discussed with the British Foreign Secretary the basic position which he thought should be taken on the Korean question and that he understood Eden to be in general agreement with him. The first question to be decided was whether we regarded the conference as a possible basis for serious negotiation about the unity and independence of Korea or whether we considered in advance that a solution was impossible and should therefore have an eye only to a propaganda position. He stated it to be the view of the United States Government that an earnest effort should be made at Geneva to bring about the unity and independence of Korea. He recognized that the chances of success were not great and that this pessimism was shared even more strongly [by] the ROK Government. Nevertheless, the conference should not be regarded as hopeless. He maintained that a certain gain had been achieved at Berlin in getting the Soviet Union to agree, in the resolution providing for the calling of the Geneva conference, to a statement that the unity and independence of Korea was a step conducive to the relaxation of tension in Asia. This was an advance over the armistice agreement in that it established the principle of the desirability of a united and independent Korea. The Soviet Union might not intend to bring this about, but the Geneva conference would at least start off with the recognition of all participants that the unity and independence of Korea was an important objective with regard to Asian security. The Secretary of State noted that in this recognition there was an implicit relationship to the end of the fighting in Indo-China.

5. Turning to tactics he said that we should avoid putting forward a final position at the outset. He observed that trading with the Communists was a painful process and that it was necessary to have possibilities of compromise and exchange up one's sleeve, if there were to be a successful outcome. The United States attitude at Geneva, to begin with at least, would be based on the position that the United Nations some years ago had embarked upon a programme to accomplish the aims with regard to Korea which are repeated in the Berlin communiqué. Had aggression in Korea not occurred, the United Nations Commission which had been appointed to achieve these aims should have been able to complete its task. Now that fighting has ceased, the United Nations programme, which had been interrupted by aggression, should now carry forward.

6. Dulles declared that, as an initial position, this would be sound and moral and would also contain certain bargaining elements, if it were necessary to employ them. Such an initial position would call for holding of elections in the territory to which the United Nations Commission had not yet had access, fulfilling in that way the United Nations task. He said that he realized that many, in his own government as well as others, would not regard this proposal as the final acceptable solution. However, in his view it was important not to give away the trading points in advance. He then argued, perhaps at this point with a little sophistry, that, if the objective at Geneva were only to win a propaganda victory, it might then be advisable to start off with a more ideal position and rest on it in order to appeal to the world.

7. He concluded his discussion of the Korean aspect of the conference by entering a reservation that, in this whole matter, the views of the ROK were of the highest importance; so that what he had said was conditional upon talks which he would have with the ROK delegation at Geneva. He stated that there was no possibility of taking a position which the ROK would not accept because no one proposed to force anything upon the Korean Government. Generally speaking, he advised that the initial position should be presented in vague and general terms, so as to ascertain the mood and intentions of the Communists.

GENEVA CONFERENCE

We discussed the Geneva Conference at a lunch Eden gave in London yesterday for Australian, Canadian and United Kingdom representatives. It is clear that nothing at all has been settled on procedural matters essential before the conference can open.

2. A number of suggestions have been tossed about on the question of a chairman, or at least of providing someone to open the first meeting. I did not encourage a suggestion Eden made on Tuesday that I might act as chairman. We considered the possibility of Hammarskjöld presiding, but agree that the Russians — and probably the Americans as well — would not accept this because of their insistence on disassociating the United Nations from the Geneva meeting. The idea of having the President of the Swiss Republic open the conference as host was also rejected on the grounds of the Swiss desire to stay neutral. Eden wondered, not entirely flippantly, if we might consider Molotov as a permanent chairman. He had been a good chairman at Berlin, and the role would inhibit him somewhat. The objection to having rotating chairmen is that the United States would not sit under a North Korean or a Chinese. I suggested we might rotate with the interested parties, i.e. the two Koreas and China, excluded. Eden and Casey liked this idea, and Eden said he would suggest it to Dulles.

3. Eden said it had been agreed — presumably with Dulles and Bidault — that the meetings would be private and the press would be allowed in only to take pictures. As at Berlin, each delegation would be responsible for briefing the press on what took place.

4. As for the seating arrangements, consideration is being given to a so-called “auditorium plan”, based on the Assembly Chamber in Geneva. This provides for two horseshoe rings, one behind the other. The Americans like it because it would place them directly behind the South Koreans. The French, after having made no comment on this for a week, now say they don’t like it, but have no alternative to offer. It is most important that some agreement be reached, at least on the chamber to be used so that a start can be made on wiring it. Eden thought, however, that at least the opening round of speeches could be delivered from a platform.

5. Dennis Allen reported his talks a few days ago in Paris with the French on Indo-China. For the first time it appears that the French — or at least French officials — instead of repudiating any mention of partition, have talked tentatively along the following lines. They might seek an agreement with the Communists according to which the latter would evacuate Laos and Cambodia entirely, and the French would restrict themselves to positions specified in their agreements with those States. They would also be prepared to talk to the Communists about a mutual withdrawal to positions in Vietnam which would leave the Vietminh in the north and Vietnam in the rest of the country. Allen was not at all specific about these ideas, reflecting, I think, the very general terms in which the French had talked.

6. Eden was emphatic that agreement should not be reached on the composition of the conference sessions on Indo-China until the Colombo conference had ended, lest an opportunity be given to Nehru to point to the exclusion from these discussions of all the countries represented in Colombo.¹¹ However, the United States were anxious to settle the question of participation in Paris. Casey mentioned the Australian desire to participate, which he seemed to take for granted. Eden, while agreeing, had told me Tuesday evening that he had hoped that Indo-Chinese discussions might be limited to the four — the Indo-Chinese and “neighbouring states”, e.g. Burma and Thailand.

7. There was a discussion of the next phase of consultation. Eden, Dulles and Bidault will be meeting in Paris on the subject today, although Eden was somewhat caustic about the fact that he had made a great effort to leave London early and had then learned that Bidault could spare only forty-five minutes. There will undoubtedly be informal talks in Paris, as the Australians will also be on hand, but it was agreed that there were obvious objections to anything in the way of more formal consultations among the NATO countries involved. It was proposed, however, that we should meet on arrival in Geneva Sunday evening. Eden thought it important that some one but not all three western inviting powers, see Molotov Sunday morning to reach some agreement on the essential procedural matters.

On April 26 the procedural difficulties which had threatened the conference with delay were cleared up without trouble.

2. In the morning Mr. Dulles presided at a meeting on the foreign ministers' level of the group of sixteen. After expressing the hope that the members of the group would pursue a common approach at the conference in carrying out the objectives of the whole action in Korea. He said that since certain details for conference arrangements had [devolved] upon the four inviting powers as a result of the Berlin conference. Mr. Eden was interviewing Mr. Molotov and will report to the meeting on any agreement reached with the latter on these details.

3. He then explained the seating arrangements for the conference to which Mr. Molotov had agreed. The plan called for the seating of all delegations according to the English alphabet, with China being listed under 'P' for Peoples Republic of China, and North Korea under 'D' for Democratic Peoples Republic. The inner semi-circle would have eight delegations, the second eight and the last three.

The Canadian delegation consisted of L.B. Pearson as delegate, John Holmes and Chester Ronning as alternates and Charles McGaughey and A.C.E. Joly de Lotbinière as advisors.

4. Mr. Eden then arrived and informed the meeting of his agreement with Mr. Molotov on the following principal points:

(a) concerning language interpretations it was agreed that subsequent translations would be made one day in English, one day in French, and the third day in Russian, continuing in such order. At such time there would be simultaneous translations in the five principal languages;

(b) the press would be excluded from all meetings;

(c) no nation would be permitted to have an official observer;

(d) there would be a panel of three chairmen. Each of whom would be chosen from one of the following groups:

(1) the Soviet Union or China;

(2) France, the United Kingdom or the United States;

(3) one from the remainder.

5. The meeting of the sixteen agreed that the panel of chairmen should consist of Mr. Molotov, Mr. Eden and Prince Wan of Thailand. Subsequently Mr. Eden obtained Soviet concurrence in an arrangement by which Prince Wan would act as chairman of the first meeting, with Mr. Molotov and Mr. Eden following in rotation of subsequent days.

6. Mr. Dulles then suggested that meetings at the deputy level be held every morning and stated that Mr. Alexis Johnson would represent the United States at these meetings.

7. Mr. Pyun of the R.O.K. asked for the opportunity to speak first when the conference turned to substantive matters and received the support of Mr. Dulles. There was no objection to his request.

8. Turning to the agenda Mr. Dulles said that the inviting powers might seek agreement on it. He thought it much more satisfactory to have this conference based on the Berlin agreement, rather than on the armistice agreement, since the former called for the "establishment of a united and independent Korea", and did not mention the withdrawal of belligerent forces. Moreover, the R.O.K. could request the withdrawal of the Chinese from North Korea so that the Chinese might purge themselves of aggression without a corresponding withdrawal of United Nations forces from the South.

9. Considerable discussion took place as to the advisability of adopting United Nations procedure, but Mr. Eden explained that Mr. Molotov had agreed that for the time being no rules of procedures needed to be adopted.

10. The conference opened in the afternoon on schedule with Prince Wan in the chair. He announced the various arrangements which had been reached earlier and described above, and said that each chairman would be free to choose his own assistants in his task, at which time he called on Mr. Kural, the Secretary-General of the Allied Secretariat for the conference and an associate to flank him. He mentioned that he only had the name of the R.O.K. on his list of speakers and said that speakers would be called on in the order in which their names were inscribed. Since the day's meeting was only to settle the organization of the conference he then announced an adjournment.

The first of what are intended as regular, possibly daily, sessions of deputies of the sixteen was held this morning (April 27). Kural, as our Secretary-General, opened the meeting but Alexis Johnson took over on the assumption that these meetings were to be a continuation of the Washington sessions.

2. Johnson began with a lengthy exposition of American aims and intentions on the Korean question. It was a rigid statement of views already known to you. Our policy must be based on the position that we were not making a fresh start on Korea but were merely seeking to complete the process of reunification already undertaken by the United Nations. Unless the Communists were willing to give up their position on North Korea the conference was bound to fail. He emphasized the importance of the united front while recognizing that there might be differences of emphasis and minor differences of tactics among us.

3. In a somewhat formal session of this kind with the ROK present, it was difficult to have anything like a frank discussion of the issues. Neither we nor the Australians and New Zealanders are very happy about the American approach which seems to be based on the assumption that we are victors and leaves no room for manoeuvres at all. Allen of the United Kingdom tactfully expressed agreement with the fundamental aims of the Americans, but emphasized the importance of our putting forward proposals which the world would recognize as reasonable, and the Communists will have difficulty rejecting. Watt of Australia and Lacoste of France spoke of the importance of not always speaking with the same voice in meetings, even though we maintained a basic unity.

4. The rest of the meeting was devoted to a discussion of tactics for the afternoon's meeting, in particular of plans for frustrating Molotov's knavish tricks which, as it turned out, he didn't play.

KOREA — GENEVA CONFERENCE

The second day of the conference was again happily marked by the failure of the expected to materialize. Molotov was a courteous competent chairman, and both Pyun of South Korea and Nam Il of North Korea spoke with unfamiliar moderation. The third speaker, Angel of Colombia, put the conference and his country's participation in it firmly in a United Nations perspective. He made a good case for consistency between any solution of the Korean problem which might be found, and Korean policy as laid down by the United Nations.

2. Both Korean delegates spoke in Korean. Pyun's speech, already sterile enough, was further marred by the subsequent inept English translation by his staff interpreter. Nam Il's speech was improved technically by his pausing after each para for translation.

3. Pyun began by pointing out that all Koreans were of same stock and emphasized the hostility of most of those in the north to their Governors who had sold out the fatherland to foreigners. He recounted developments in the peninsula since 1945 and pointed out that before the aggression all that remained to achieve the unification of Korea under United Nations auspices were elections above the parallel. It would, therefore, adversely reflect on the United Nations if elections were now called for in both South and North Korea. He attacked Communist China for interfering in the internal affairs of Korea and said that the Chinese Communists, like all Communists, owed allegiance to the Soviet Union. He denied that his government loved fighting but insisted that peace could not be bought at the price of freedom. He concluded by calling for co-operation all around but made no specific proposals.

4. Nam Il began by recounting the familiar Communist interpretation of Korean developments since 1945. He assessed the United States with blame for the aggression but did not deliver an harangue on this point. He stressed the importance of strict observation of the Armistice Agreement as a pre-condition to the unification of Korea and then made proposals for achieving this goal which, on their face, are neither implausible nor surprising.

5. In summary, they called for a conference decision by which:

(a) A joint Korean commission would be elected by both Assemblies which would provide for free elections to a National Assembly from which would come a unified Korean Government.

(b) In the interim the commission would work for the establishment of economic and cultural relations between the two Koreas.

(c) The necessity of all foreign forces withdrawing from Korea within six months would be recognized.

(d) The states primarily concerned would recognize the necessity of creating conditions helpful to bringing about rapid unification of a democratic independent Korea.

6. Nam Il did not say that both Koreas would be equally represented on his proposed commission, but this conclusion would seem to follow from his proposals. His plan also cuts across the principle of internationally supervised elections.

7. Since Dulles, the next speaker on the list, preferred to speak on April 28, Molotov adjourned the afternoon meeting at 5 o'clock.

CONFIDENTIAL

KOREA — GENEVA CONFERENCE

As this week has progressed, the conference has developed into a debate on Korea in the fashion of the United Nations and no less public. The principals of both sides have staked out their positions and the usefulness of further general debate in accomplishing the purposes of the conference has become highly questionable. The problem came under consideration at a meeting on April 29 of the sixteen, at the ministerial level. Then Eden advocated that the group approach the Communists with the suggestion that the conference begin restricted sessions, i.e., those concerning which the press would not be briefed, and state our final position on the necessity of elections being internationally supervised.

2. Pyun, with the support of Dulles, insisted that he be given an opportunity to reply in the general debate to Communist allegations. While recognizing the desirability of private negotiations with the Communists, I emphasized the importance of the group reaching first an agreed position. I hoped we could start discussions among ourselves very soon towards this end. While we could not permit the conference to break up on the question of the scope of the elections, we should take a very strong stand regarding their supervision.

3. Throughout the meeting Dulles threw his weight behind Pyun and called for consideration of the issue of life and death facing the ROK Government. Pyun must have adequate time for consultation with Seoul. I made it clear that we did not wish to alter the status of the ROK Government as the only legitimate one in Korea but said that on such narrower questions as the scope of the elections the group might have earlier discussions. Pyun insisted that proposals on our side could not be formulated hastily and stated flatly that his government would make no concessions for nothing.

4. In the event it was decided to appoint a subcommittee consisting of the United States, United Kingdom, France, the ROK, Thailand, Australia, Colombia, the Philippines and Turkey, to meet at the official level and formulate proposals which might be submitted for consideration to the group of sixteen. It was also agreed that Pyun should have a chance to reply in plenary to Communist charges.

5. A member of our delegation attended as an observer the first meeting of the group of nine on April 30. Johnson for the United States said that the group should draft proposals which would be the last word among ourselves. How these should be used tactically would be a matter for subsequent decision. Allen for the United Kingdom pointed out that as long as the proposals were carefully drafted they need not be detailed.

6. At this point the Philippine representative presented a plan calling for a constitutional convention. The peninsula would be divided into districts, each populated by 200,000 people and each choosing one representative to the convention in free elections. These would be internationally supervised by a panel of countries, perhaps neutral, acceptable to both North and South Korea.

7. This plan immediately drew the fire of the South Korean Representative, Yang, who said that the constitutional authorities and sovereignty of the ROK must at all times be upheld. The Philippine proposals by-passed the United Nations, which had already supervised elections in his country. Johnson backed him up strongly and took the position that any international supervision of Korean elections should be United Nations. The Filipino replied that the Communists were not represented on UNCURK and that we should now devise some form of supervision which could be acceptable to them. Johnson defended the basic question as being how far we could move towards the Communists and answered it by saying that we could not abandon the point of United Nations supervision. If the Communists accepted free and proportional elections, they would accept United Nations supervision.

8. It then dawned on both Johnson and Yang that the Philippines was scheduled to speak in the general debate that afternoon. The Filipino confirmed that their statement would outline the plan he had suggested. Johnson attacked the plan from another angle by saying that a constitutional convention gave rise to quote enormous problems unquote such as the setting up of a new administrative structure while the present one was still in existence and then trying to effect the transfer of authority to the new organization. After a further bitter exchange during which Yang asked if the Filipino would accept a demand by the Huks for a constitutional convention, the Philippine representative agreed to defer their statement until Monday and to review the matter with his minister.

9. Critchley of Australia who has been maintaining close contact with the ROK delegate, tells us that they are operating under very narrow instructions which still preclude them from accepting elections other than in North Korea.

Following from the Minister, Begins: On Friday Livingstone Merchant asked if he could see me. We talked for an hour. He was in a very gloomy and depressed state of mind over conference developments. In so far as Korea is concerned the United States and United Nations had received little support from their friends against attacks made by the Communists who had to some extent succeeded in making it appear that it was the United States against the Communists with the rest of us, more or less indifferent in between. This he felt would create a very bad impression in the United States and in Asia. He mentioned specifically that in the general discussion there had been no speech from a European delegate or from us. I replied that I thought he exaggerated the effect of the Communist speeches on international opinion, but he disagreed. I also emphasized that our non-participation in the debate was dictated merely by our anxiety to get down to the work of negotiation; also because we had [doubts] about the initial position taken up by South Korea and the United States in regard to unification plans and therefore did not wish to give the appearance of opposing these proposals by ignoring them in a public statement. Merchant said that we need not worry about this, because it was only an initial position anyway and they would not mind if we ignored it in public statements.

2. I told him that I would have a word with Eden and that while we thought their worries exaggerated on this score I could make a statement on Monday if that seemed desirable.

3. As it happened while Merchant was talking to me, Dulles was talking to Eden on exactly the same lines. We both, therefore, are considering interventions on Monday or Tuesday which we hope may give some solace and comfort to our friends.

4. Merchant was even more gloomy about Indo-China. He felt that the differing views and the growing confusion was putting a severe strain on the alliance. I agreed, but said that the confusion emanated in part I thought from Washington where views seem to change from day to day with Nixon, one week hinting at the necessity of sending troops while President Eisenhower and others were giving assurance that American boys will not go to the jungles of Indo-China and that what is required now is a modus vivendi with the Communists along the lines of that worked out in Europe. French weakness and uncertainty added to the confusion while the perplexing nature of Franco-American moves last week-end had played its part.

5. Merchant gave me the American accent of these moves and assured me that they really were in response to feverish and excitable French pleas though he agreed that the intervention of Admiral Radford had not been very wise and might have been the source of legitimate British fears. Their real complaint against the United Kingdom was not that it had been unable to co-operate last week-end but that London had refused to keep on building up Mr. Dulles's bargaining position at Geneva by agreeing to a meeting of the "10" before the conference opened to discuss Southeast Asian security questions. That would have made quite an impression on the Communists.

6. I then gave him the British side of this case; that Mr. Dulles should have been willing to stand on the London communiqué and that his move to follow that up by a meeting of the 10 before the conference had been premature and would have had a bad effect not only on the conference but on free Asian public opinion.

7. We then discussed possible solutions for ending the Indo-Chinese war but nothing new emerged, except a restatement of the American position against any form of partition and an indication of their suspicion that the British were now active in promoting this idea, something which I do not believe to be the case though along with every other possible way out of the difficulty it is being canvassed by the United Kingdom and indeed by other delegations.

8. I think it is safe to say that Merchant was sent by Mr. Dulles to talk to me along the above lines though he indicated that the visit was a personal idea of his.

9. I was glad to have this talk with Merchant because it gave me an opportunity to emphasize to him our desire to assist in any possible way and to avoid any position which would suggest that we were indifferent to United States difficulties or less than anxious to co-operate in overcoming them.

PRELIMINARY CONTACTS WITH CHINESE COMMUNISTS

Chinese Communists who knew Ronning in Chungking and Nanking have been very cordial in personal contacts. Wang Pin-Nan, Secretary General of their delegation who frequently visited the Canadian Embassy in China in 1946-47, shook hands with Ronning on the first day and greetings were exchanged in German, indicating relaxation regarding exclusive use of Chinese. Ronning also shook hands with Chou En-Lai and exchanged a few pleasantries. Subsequently, Mr. Wang approached Ronning expressing the wish of Chou to meet the Canadian Minister. The meeting took place casually on the following day after the meeting, and the two Ministers spoke very briefly. After this meeting Wang again approached Ronning and in a fairly lengthy conversation referred to the unofficial negotiations which had been conducted in May 1950, regarding exchange of diplomatic missions.¹³ The Canadian Prime Minister's recent statements in the Far East had been regarded as statesmanlike by them. Wang was politely informed that no consideration of this question was being given by the Canadian Government nor could be until after an acceptable peace had been reached in Korea ending the conflict in which Canadian troops had participated. Wang said that he understood and expressed hope that a settlement would be reached during this conference.

2. The Commonwealth Foreign Ministers have expressed the opinion that it is desirable to have such informal interchanges. Mr. Casey has expressed a desire to meet Chou En Lai. Mr. Kenneth Young who was with Arthur Dean in Panmunjom has informed us that he has exchanged pleasantries with the North Koreans who had been so completely unapproachable when they sat across the table from him in Panmunjom, but he has found the Chinese who were there unapproachable, including Huang Hua who has also avoided greeting Ronning although he was the first representative of the Peking Foreign Office in Nanking after Communist occupation.

KOREA

Allen of the United Kingdom delegation has given us a report of the second session held Saturday afternoon May 1 by the Heads of the United States, United Kingdom, USSR, French, Chinese, North and South Korean delegations.

2. By agreement in advance Eden presided. Dulles produced a proposed agenda which merely mentioned the five major headings:

Election withdrawal of forces etc. The two Koreans were invited to speak. Pyun reserved his right to speak and Nam Il set out on a forceful recapitulation of the points he had made in plenary session. He was supported by Chou En-Lai and Molotov. Allen said that what was most notable in the three presentations, was the common insistence on the fact that this conference had nothing to do with the United Nations, that the United Nations was not a neutral and that by "the aggressor resolution" the United Nations had forfeited any moral right to act as mediator or arbitrator. At the very end, Pyun took up his right to speak and set out firmly the arguments he had previously made.

3. Eden and Dulles endeavoured to bring the meeting down to some concrete subjects, such as the nature of supervision, but without much success. It was agreed that nothing would be said to the press except that the meeting had taken place. No objection was raised when Dulles said that the other members of the conference would have to be informed of what took place. At the conclusion of the session Dulles said it had been a useful exchange. No specific plans were made for a further meeting but Eden indicated that they would consider reconvening after the plenary statements had been concluded. The tone of the meeting seems to have been reasonable. Allen described it as "not an angry session". The 16 are to meet this morning to receive a report. It remains to be seen whether the participants can if these secret sessions continue resist for long the hordes of frustrated and importunate journalists encamped hereabouts.

4. In the meantime a small British, French and American drafting group is trying to hammer out a series of initial proposals which might be put forward by the 16. This would represent our first position, and would not make many concessions although it might call for elections in the whole country as almost all of the 16 are unhappy about the American and South Korean position on that subject. Nothing is being said about the tripartite drafting as it is hoped that the Americans would have a better chance to sell the end product to the South Koreans if they believe it to be all-American. Delegates on our side are becoming increasingly aware of the impression caused by our failure to produce concrete proposals, and it is hoped that these can be agreed upon soon. We shall probably have to stretch out the general debate, however, for several days before we can find even an initial position acceptable to the South Koreans and the Americans on the one hand, and on the other hand for example to the Philippines who have somewhat surprisingly turned out to be our left wing. (Magsaysay's anxiety to work his passage back as a good Asian may turn out to be a not unimportant political factor at this conference).

5. Eden and Bidault have not yet decided to speak. Eden does not want to commit himself at this point and Bidault is not much interested in Korea. I have preferred not to make a statement either in the hope that we could all get down to business sooner if the general statements were limited. However, the Americans have made so clear to us their disappointment with their friends for not declaring their support that I shall probably make a brief statement on Monday or Tuesday refuting some of the grosser slanders against the United States and asking Nam Il a few questions related to his proposals.

MEETING OF 16, MINISTERIAL LEVEL, AT AMERICAN HEADQUARTERS

Bedell Smith presided, and Eden presented a brief account of the restricted meeting held on Saturday afternoon, a report of which has already been sent to you. The only additional information given by Eden was that the Communists insisted upon complete equality of the North and South Korean Governments. They were also opposed to the creation of any buffer or neutral zone, after unification. Eden summed up his impression by saying that the meeting had been useful in showing where each side stood, although it did not bring the two sides any closer together.

2. Bedell Smith gave as his first impression of the restricted meeting that the Communists were resorting to their traditional technique. He had not expected to hear such charges against the United States expressed so vehemently, and stated that he would never allow such falsifications to go unanswered. He solicited the support of all delegates present to give effective answers. The Communists had made a serious and grave challenge to the United Nations which had been assaulted violently. He considered this a greater issue than Korea. The integrity and future of the United Nations called for vigorous defence. The United Nations must not be considered a belligerent.

3. I referred to the Communist technique of all speaking with one voice. So far we have been unable to do this as we have not yet agreed upon specific concert proposals. The sooner this is done the sooner can we put the Communists in a defensive position, such as that into which we have already been forced. Webb and the Philippine Minister pressed for early agreement on the proposals being worked upon by the committee of nine. It was evident that Alexis Johnson's hesitation in announcing the probable date when these proposals would be finished was due to the fact that they were now being given consideration by ROK, through Mr. Pyun, and that some time would be taken before ROK's support could be obtained. A sub-committee of three (U.S.A., United Kingdom, and France) have now agreed on a draft which will be submitted to the committee of nine before consideration by the sixteen which cannot very well take place before Friday.

4. The Philippine Minister took sharp issue with Mr. Pyun charging that his demand, that we should now devote ourselves to studying the Communist's proposals in order to counter them, was a negative approach.

5. When Lord Reading suggested that some time would have to be devoted to the question of Indo-China this week, Mr. Pyun immediately expressed his misgivings about introducing that question. He feared that there would be a demand to count only those days devoted to Korea in the total of 90. This would prolong the conference beyond the 90 day limit which he seemed to assume would be the maximum time for the conference.

6. At the conclusion of the meeting Bedell Smith took the position that we must emphasize that this conference was based on United Nations decisions and that we were here to carry them out. He apparently had not been informed of Dulles' statement at our first meeting which emphasized that this conference must by no means be considered to be under the auspices of the United Nations, but had been called entirely as a result of the Berlin conference.

Copies of my speech in today's general debate are going forward by air mail. Following are excerpts:

The Canadian Government has supported and remains bound by these United Nations decisions, therefore we cannot support any proposal which denies their validity or which would equate at this conference the moral and political status of the United Nations in respect of the Korean question with those governments which have broken the United Nations Charter by taking aggressive military action against the Republic of Korea. The right to be free does not include the obligation to be Communist and Asia for the Asians is not the same as indeed is the opposite of Asia for the Cominform. It would be no contribution either to Asian peace or prosperity, independence or dignity if the Japanese East Asian co-prosperity sphere were exchanged for the Chinese East Asian co-Communist empire.

In their speeches to this conference, the leaders of the delegations of the Soviet Union and the Peoples' Republic of China have attacked the United States for a policy of aggressive imperialism in Asia which they allege stands in the way of freedom for the Asian peoples. As the leader of the delegation of a country which is a neighbour of the most powerful state in the world, I can say with a conviction based on our national experience that the people of the United States are neither aggressive nor imperialist and it is the people of the United States that freely elect their governments. If indeed the United States did not respect the rights and interests of others, Canada would not today be an independent power but merely a satellite of her great neighbour. Her representatives would not be able, as they certainly are able to speak their own minds and stand up for their own views in conferences of the nations even if this means, as it has more than once meant disagreeing with some aspects of the policy of the United States of America.

In his second statement made yesterday, Mr. Chou En-Lai brought up the question of prisoners of war. It is difficult to understand why, if he is sincere in his desire to press forward with a peaceful solution of the Korean problems. If the Geneva Convention is cited by the leader of the Chinese delegation I would remind him of the thousands of South Korean prisoners who disappeared without a trace shortly after capture, of the failure to account for many United Nations prisoners, of the refusal to allow the Red Cross to visit them or to give information concerning them, of the cruel treatment and torturing interrogations to which many of them were subjected. Certainly, if this question were raised for discussion at this conference, there would be much to talk about but the net result would be merely to delay and possibly prevent the work we have come here to accomplish, namely, to bring peace and freedom to a united Korea.

While, Mr. Chairman, the questions I have been raising are all important, our primary concern at this conference is a peace settlement for Korea. On that subject the leader of the North Korean delegation has presented a number of proposals which have been endorsed by the delegations of the Peoples' Republic of China and the USSR. Those proposals have not, however, been adequately defined or explained. The first point concerns the method of selection and operation of the proposed All Korean Commission. The question on this point which I had intended to ask was answered yesterday by the leader of the delegation from North Korea. He said that his proposed All Korean Commission must be simple in its organization and function in all matters procedural and otherwise by agreement on both sides. We know from long and bitter experience what this means. It means that the All Korean Commission would operate as the Communist members wished or not at all. This device of agreement on both sides, irrespective of the number of members or the number of people represented, would, if nothing else, make the All Korean Commission completely unworkable, unfair and unacceptable and that Commission seems to be a central and vital part of the North Korean proposals.

There are one or two other questions about these proposals that occur to one. What is meant by the largest democratic, social organizations in South and North Korea? Does the word democratic exclude anti-Communist or non-Communist organizations? How would the representatives of these democratic social organizations be chosen for the All Korean Commission and would there be an equal number from North and South Korea? Does the phrase "terror groups" mean anti-Communist political parties? Furthermore if no United Nations or other impartial international supervision of Korean elections to ensure that they will be free is permissible — as Mr. Nam Il states, how can this freedom be guaranteed in districts where bitter animosities and fears and local tyrannies would make impartial Korean supervision quite impossible?

It is clear, Mr. Chairman, that the most superficial examination of the North Korean proposals shows that they provide no hope for bringing about a free united and democratic Korea. Such hope lies in the acceptance by this conference of the principles laid down by United Nations resolutions for the solution of this problem, principles accepted by the vast majority of the nations of the world. These provide for a union of all the Korean people under a government chosen by those people. This United Korea will need some international guarantee against aggression. It will also require and be entitled to economic assistance from other countries to repair the cruel devastation and destruction of war.

Before concluding, Mr. Chairman, I would like to refer briefly to the interesting and significant communication which we have received from the Conference of Asian Prime Ministers which has just met in Colombo. This represents an important and constructive effort by a group of free Asian states to assist in, and, I hope, take some responsibility for the peaceful settlement of Asian problems in their part of the world.

As the communication deals primarily with the question of Indo-China I do not wish to make any detailed appraisal of the recommendations it contains. I would, however, like to call attention to the importance attached by these Asian leaders to the role of the United Nations in furthering the peaceful purposes of this conference, particularly in respect of Indo-China. If these peaceful purposes are not achieved by a just, honourable and negotiated settlement, the consequences will be bad and probably far reaching. Failure here may well necessitate further collective consideration by those who, as a result of such failure, will feel increasingly threatened of further ways and means to meet that threat. This in its turn may harden and make more dangerous the great and tragic division in the world which now exists. The reward for success at Geneva will be great in terms of peaceful progress but the penalty of failure may be even greater in terms of increasing tensions and the risk of a war which would engulf and destroy us all.

You might consider whether last paragraphs should be passed to New Delhi.

Ward Allen of the State Department has just telephoned to express the Department's appreciation for the speech which the Minister delivered yesterday. The United States delegation, in cabling a lengthy summary of the speech, made the observation that its net effect had been to strengthen the broad basis of allied unity, which had become somewhat battered. The delegation added the comment that the Minister's analysis of the North Korean plan for unification was particularly effective.

CONVERSATION WITH WANG PIN-NAN

Ronning lunched with Wang Pin-Nan yesterday to obtain consideration for Canadians in Chinese prisons. Mr. Trevelyan, United Kingdom Chargé in Peking, had already informed Chinese Communists that Ronning would like to discuss Canadian cases with them. The conversation took place entirely in Chinese.

2. Wang spoke at length on the subject of great progress made in China under new regime which had introduced new reforms and elevated the standard of living of the people. He invited Ronning to return to China to see for himself. Wang was given a report of the great progress in Canada in recent years which had benefitted Canadian people and Ronning invited him to come to Canada to see for himself how well off Canadians were.

3. Wang again referred to importance of establishing diplomatic relations and was told that their failure to accept United Kingdom recognition prevented many others from considering the problem. Wang replied that the United Kingdom had failed to support them in the United Nations and that there were a number of other minor issues, which he did not specify, that still stood in the way. He agreed, however, that these issues could be cleared up more easily when Peking sends an Ambassador to London.

4. The discussion then drifted to the issues at stake in the conference. Wang felt that the differences on the question of the scope of the elections could be resolved in the light of Mr. Casey's appeal to the South Koreans to agree to elections throughout Korea. On the question of withdrawal of troops, however, he feared that the Americans would not consent to release the foothold which they had in Korea which provided a base for them to carry out their designs to bring about a collapse of the Peoples' Government. He was assured at this point that the Americans were just as anxious to withdraw their troops from Korea as the Canadians were and that there was no doubt about Canadian desire to withdraw troops as soon as the situation in Korea made it feasible. He was also told that our side was not opposed to the principle of withdrawal of troops and that if the Chinese were prepared to withdraw their troops from North Korea that the question surely could be resolved by an agreement for some sort of withdrawal by stages. On the question of supervision of elections Wang stated it was very important to leave this matter to the Koreans themselves to settle so that their own freedom would not be interfered with by outsiders. He was informed that it was not the intention of our side to interfere with the affairs of the Koreans but that in order to ensure free elections to protect the rights of the Koreans themselves, our side would stand firm on the question of supervision. Ronning then said to Wang "surely the Chinese, who have always attached importance to the calling in of a middle man to settle disputes and not to interfere with the rights of the contending parties, would understand the absolute necessity of supervision by a third party so that free elections could be a reality in Korea". Wang smiled and said he would not argue against the analogy.

5. In again referring to the importance of establishing diplomatic relations between Canada and China, Wang said there were no outstanding differences between our nations and no insoluble problems. Ronning agreed that after a peace settlement had been reached that other issues could no doubt be resolved. The Canadian people were very sensitive about the ill treatment which had been accorded to many Canadians in China by the new regime. Three Roman Catholic priests at least were still being held in prison and another had for three years been denied an exit permit to leave Shanghai to return to Canada. This was a matter of grave concern not only for the Roman Catholic population in Canada, which comprises about 40 percent of the total, but for all the people of Canada and the Canadian Government. It was suggested that if Peking was sincere in resolving differences it would be wise action on Wang's part to recommend to his government to free these priests and permit them to return to Canada. Wang said he fully understood and gave his assurance that he would see that an investigation was made of the possibility suggested, if the names were submitted to him. He was then given a list of the names and he again promised consideration would be given to the matter.

COMMUNIST AIMS

1. To divide us from, and isolate the United States.
2. To strengthen the prestige and position of Communist China.
3. To establish that the two sides to the Korean conflict are on the same basis at this conference, and that the United States, not a discredited United Nations, is one side.
4. To rule out and get acceptance for the idea that Asia for the Communists is the same as Asia for the Asians — a Communist Asian Monroe doctrine.
6. To propagandize the idea that Communist in Asia means national, economic and social freedom.
7. To accustom us to the idea that Asian problems cannot be settled, let alone negotiated, without the Chinese Communists participating.
8. To solidify the Moscow-Peking axis, at least in the eyes of others.
9. To take over Indochina, or to keep the war going there as a weakening and dividing issue for the free world.

Geneva, May 10, 1954

COMMUNIST AIMS AT THE GENEVA CONFERENCE

In your memorandum of May 8, a copy of which I attach, you requested comments on your ten point list of Communist aims at the Geneva Conference.

2. I attach a statement we have prepared which attempts to distinguish between Chinese Communist objectives and those of the Russian Communists. Although our format is different, it covers the various points you have raised.

3. Only a small portion of the attached statement is devoted to Soviet aims. This is because we have sought to limit our consideration to immediate Soviet objectives here, rather than to outline those of long standing duration. It may be that Mr. Holmes will wish to supplement or amend this section of the statement.

4. You have asked to what extent the Communists have succeeded in achieving their aims. In our opinion the very fact that the Conference has been convened carries the Chinese Communists a long way towards their goal of acceptance as a great power and points up the primacy of their position in Asia. The two most combustible problems of Asia are Korea and Indo-China, and this Conference by meeting recognizes the importance of Chinese participation in their consideration. This important development is not clouded by Mr. Dulles' ignoring of the Chinese Communists here.

5. Moreover, the extent to which the press has given prominence to the Chinese role at the Conference seems to us a good criterion for measuring the latter's world importance.

6. In so far as the importance of Communist China in the world balance of power has gained acceptance here, the importance of the Chinese Nationalists has declined. It is difficult to picture the representatives of the latter henceforth playing any important part in U.N. deliberations.

7. The Soviet Union has so far followed a policy of deferring to the Chinese at the Conference and of being reasonable on procedural matters. This course of action has tended further to point up the importance of the Chinese Communists.

C.A. R[ONNING]

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

CONFIDENTIAL

Geneva, May 10, 1954

CHINESE COMMUNIST AIMS

1. To be accepted by the world as a great power — one of the "Big Five".

In moving towards this objective Communist China must tactically seek to counter both the U.S. and the U.S.S.R.

The United States — the greatest power — stands four square against general recognition of the Peking regime and its admission to the United Nations. Thus to establish themselves as a world power the Chinese Communists must seek to win away from the leadership of the United States on these matters as many members of the free world as possible. Any success they might have along these lines will serve to strengthen both their prestige and their international position. Since the Communist world is divided into two parts and the Chinese part is Asia, it is to be expected that the Chinese will concern themselves particularly with Asian problems. Their power is in Asia, so it is basic to their desire to be recognized as a great power that no Asian problem should be considered without them.

Until the Geneva Conference, the Soviet Union has spoken for the Peking regime in world councils. The latter cannot become the "Big Fifth" unless it can get away from needing the Soviet Union as its spokesman and unless it can reduce the extent of its dependency on the U.S.S.R. for the trade necessary for industrialization and military installations.

2. To set the stage for (a) the establishment of diplomatic relations with Western nations, and (b) admission to the United Nations and replacement of the Nationalists in the Security Council.

(a) Diplomatic relations with the West can foster trade. Through trade the Chinese Communists can build up their country and free it from its present dependency on the Soviet Union. Probably the principal reason the Chinese delegation have gone out of their way to be cordial with non-Communist diplomats and correspondents is their desire to encourage the better relations conducive to international intercourse — diplomatic and commercial.¹⁴ Their attitude towards non-Communist foreigners is a reversal of that which they adopted on first coming to power.

(b) If Communist China were to replace Formosa as the representative of China in the U.N. Security Council and General Assembly, that development alone could be interpreted as international acceptance of Communist China as a peace-loving nation as required by the Charter. Thus it could be argued that China had in fact purged itself of aggression and that the new situation, now revealed, would make previous United Nations Resolutions and decisions on Korea obsolete. Moreover, U.N. membership would enable the Chinese Communists to meet the United States as an equal in the international forum, nor would they be dependent upon the good offices of the Soviet Union to be heard in the United Nations.

3. To keep the peace in Korea.

The Chinese Communists would, of course, wish to have a Korea unified in their favour, but if this is impossible, they would probably be prepared to keep the armistice agreement for the reason that a renewal of the conflict in Korea would undermine their whole position, vis-à-vis the winning of recognition as a great power. Moreover, they have cause to fear that renewed fighting would not be limited to the Korean Peninsula and in such event their industrial installations in Manchuria could be destroyed.

It is not inconsistent that the Chinese should try to discredit the United Nations on the one hand, and seek admission to this organization on the other. In their eyes the United Nations is discredited basically because it accepts as representatives of one of the world's great powers the "Kuomintang Remnant Clique". Their fears that the United States has designs on their territory are genuine. Moreover, they seek through convicting the United States of intransigence and war mongering to win the initiative in their struggle to achieve their aims in spite of the United States.

4. To halt the war in Vietnam.

It is difficult to imagine any possible form of settlement in Indo-China which would not be eventually of advantage to the Vietminh directly and to China indirectly. In Indo-China time is on the side of the Communists. It is not unlikely that they would accept a settlement by which that part of Vietnam, which was formerly under the Chinese Empire, would fall into their orbit. However, it is doubtful that the Vietminh would be satisfied with this.

The Chinese might prefer to keep the war going in Indo-China on the former basis. However, the United States has given them ample reason to believe that this

and to separate them from the USA [L.B. Pearson] cannot be the case. The present aim of the Peking regime might therefore be to curb Vietminh ambitions to the extent necessary for China to avoid becoming involved in a war with the United States.

5. To ally the fears of their non-Communist Asian neighbours.

In Asian countries which have become Communist — Mongolia and Tibet, etc., the Chinese have, of course, an interest in developing and gaining acceptance for the idea that Asia for the communists is the same as Asia for the Asians. However, in non-Communist Asian states, such as India, Indonesia, Burma, Ceylon and Japan, the Chinese Communists are seeking to develop the ideas of co-existence and of Asia for the Asians. Here they are appealing to a common Asian bond, which bond has been strengthened over the years by Western domination of Asians. Feelings against Imperialism and Colonialism are very strong in these states. In India there is no evidence of Chinese help for the local Communists. Indeed, the Chinese Communists seem to have adopted the same attitude towards Indian Communists as the Russians did towards the Chinese Communists. The Soviet Union only extended aid of importance to the Chinese Communists after they had won control over the mainland. In Japan, the Chinese are interested in improving relations generally and in fostering trade. Their first goal is to pry Japan loose from its dependency on the United States and then to profit from the resulting situation.

While in Asia the United States seems to be trying to force the countries there into line, the Chinese Communists have given¹⁵ the impression that they are prepared to let such states play an independent role so long as they do not join forces with the United States.

6. Russian Communist Aims.

To retain China in its orbit

The Soviet Union is faced with the problem of curbing Chinese ambitions resulting from the energies released in the successful Chinese revolution. The Chinese desire to become a world power and the intransigent position they have adopted may well be regarded by the Russians as a danger to their policy of easing world tensions.

However, the Russians cannot give this impression to the Chinese. Thus, in Geneva, Molotov has tried to make procedural arrangements as smooth as possible. He has brought the Chinese Communists along with him. As the Conference develops the Russians may be expected to abstain from taking the initiative in the matter of proposals. Rather, they might be expected to support Chinese and North Korean proposals in Korea and Chinese and Vietminh proposals in Indo-China. Behind the scenes they might use their influence with these administrations to soften their demands and to urge on them that in Asia time is on their side and that there are other means of achieving Communist goals which might be more effective than military action.

¹⁵ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

The U.S.S.R. does not want the Sino-Soviet treaty of friendship and alliance put to the test at this time. If China resorts to war, the Soviet Union must either fulfil its obligations under the treaty and thus run the very grave risk of a third world war, or abandon the treaty and China, with all the important balance of power connotations of such a decision.

COMMUNIST AIMS AT THE GENEVA CONFERENCE

I am inclined to agree with all ten of the Communist aims which you have enumerated. The only additional aim which I would suggest is one about which we cannot be certain, but which, if it is in fact true, is probably more important than all the others. This is the aim of reducing world tension and establishing a modus vivendi with the Western Powers. This is clearly what Mr. Molotov has been implying in his conversations with Mr. Eden. His statements seem to mean that the U.S.S.R., like at least some of the Western Powers, is anxious to stop whatever fighting is still going on between Communists and non-Communists if that fighting is likely to spread dangerously. Obviously one cannot base one's conclusions solely on what Mr. Molotov has been saying, and it would be foolish to rule out the possibility that Molotov is deliberately trying to put us off our guard. It would be just as foolish, however, to assume that he doesn't mean what he says, particularly when there is a great deal of additional evidence to support this conclusion.

2. Even though there have been some curious swings in Soviet policy since the death of Stalin, it is possible to see some constancy in the desire to eliminate the more extravagant aspects of their national life and the anxiety to avoid living too dangerously. To say that the Russians have not given up their ultimate aims but have merely adjusted their timetable, is irrelevant to a consideration of their immediate intentions. There have been periods of restraint and consolidation before in Bolshevik history, and this may well be another. I think we ought not to underestimate also the effect on Russian thinking, and perhaps also Chinese, of recent developments in hydrogen bombs. If, as we believe, American power in this field is still greater than that of the U.S.S.R., the Russians have even stronger reasons that we to be worried about small wars which might develop into big wars. This is, in a sense, not a new element, but the really frightening developments of the past few months may well have been sufficient to prod the Russians into a desperate anxiety to find some policy of getting on with the Western world. It is frequently suggested that this cannot be the case, as they have shown no willingness to make any major concessions. The answer, I think, is that they do not estimate the relative power position at the moment to be such that they need make any concessions. What they are prepared to give up is further conquest by force. As for fluid situations such as Indo-China, they will struggle to obtain a settlement on the best possible terms.

3. I agree with Mr. Ronning and Mr. McGaughey that it is important to differentiate between Soviet and Chinese aims. This is not to suggest that the axis is about to crack, but there must be differences at least of emphasis, as there are clearly differences of interest. My inclination is to think that the difference of emphasis is probably not very different from what it appears to be in Geneva — in other words, that the Russians are in fact the mediating and cautious influence Molotov appears to represent. The Chinese and the North Koreans may well have some of the brashness and belligerence of youthful movements and some of the irresponsibility of people who have not had to assume a world role. The Russians are now elder statesmen who have to direct a course with many ramifications in all parts of the world, who have learned the importance of caution and who have probably, in spite of their own peculiar myopia, a better understanding and knowledge of the United States and its friends than have their isolated Asian associates.

4. The only part of Mr. Ronning and Mr. McGaughey's memorandum with which I would differ directly is the section on page 4 dealing with the Indian Communists. It seems to me unwise to compare the position of the Indian Communists with that of the Chinese Communists just because the Chinese Communists have left them alone. The important thing is that the Russian Communists have not left the Indian Communists alone. The Indian Communist Party has been under close Moscow control and that control has sometimes been expressed in such things as the hiring and firing of leaders quite as crudely as it has in any of the European Communist parties. It may be that the Indian Communist movement developing in the south has some of the indigenous elements of the Chinese Communists, but for the most part I think the Party itself is still as much as a satellite and alien agency as Communist parties in other parts of the world.

Some of us have been pressing hard for a meeting of the 16 to discuss our own proposals for a Korean settlement and for a report on the attitude of the Republic of Korea.

2. I put our anxieties at present delays to Bedell Smith last night and he added to these anxieties by indicating that they were not making much progress with Syngman Rhee; that we might have to forego any plans of our own, merely rejecting those put forward by the Communists. He agreed that this was not a very satisfactory position but thought that it was defensible in view of the attitude taken by the Communists and the undesirability of an open split among the 16. They were still very anxious to avoid that split and hoped to have news from Seoul soon that might be more favourable than that received recently. They were still working on Syngman Rhee.

3. Bedell Smith agreed that we could not postpone a meeting of the 16 much longer and I have just heard that it is to be called for tomorrow morning. The hour has been fixed at 10 to suit my convenience as I will go straight from the meeting to the airport and hope to be in London in time for the opening of the atomic talks later in the afternoon, when general statements are to be made by the five delegates.¹⁶

CANADIANS HELD IN CHINA

Wang Ping-Nan invited Ronning for lunch today to reply to the request made on May 4 on behalf of Canadians held in China. He stated that a telegram had been sent to Peking immediately after the request had been made giving instructions to investigate the cases. He was happy to be able to report now that one of the individuals concerned had already been released and that favourable consideration was being given to the others who would also be released. Ronning thanked him for his efforts on behalf of these Canadian citizens and for his prompt reply.

KOREA — GENEVA CONFERENCE

Bedell Smith opened the meeting of Sixteen on May 13 making the following points:

- (a) Our side could not agree to detailed proposals at this time;
- (b) The Communists, and most recently Molotov, had rejected a United Nations basis for the unification of Korea including proportionate free elections;
- (c) We should keep the general debate going as long as possible. Since Rhee remained ready to consider any of our proposals, some delegation might state certain principles which we could gradually develop;
- (d) ROK Government and constitution founded on United Nations resolutions must not be repudiated.

2. Pyun, who was sharply questioned by Garcia of The Philippines as to the possibility of any ROK flexibility in the issue of all-Korean elections, argued that:

- (a) Controversial issues should not be raised nor concessions made at this time;
- (b) Since the ROK constitution contained no provision for all-Korean elections, his group would have to solve this problem before it could accept such elections;
- (c) The important issue was United Nations supervision of elections.

3. Spaak agreed with Garcia that we were in an unfavourable position and suggested informing the Conference of our support for the principle of all-Korean elections under United Nations supervision and the withdrawal of foreign troops when security was restored. Eden favoured the early implementation of this idea. Smith called for the compilation by the Group of Nine of a statement of principles upon which all the governments concerned would have to agree before they were presented to the Conference.

4. The Minister stated that:

- (a) We should rally on positive common ground to prevent world opinion from assessing us with any blame for the failure of the Conference;
- (b) If we did not so rally and insisted instead on elections being held only in North Korea and on only Chinese troops being withdrawn it would cause world opinion to attach blame to us for a breakdown instead of placing all the blame on the Communists where it belonged;

(c) All-Korean elections were consistent with United Nations principles;
 (d) Agreed principles for Conference consideration should be formulated in a few days.

5. Smith said that if we failed to agree on these principles nothing should be put forward.

6. Although Watt of Australia and Lacoste of France expressed preference for a detailed plan it was finally agreed that the Group of Nine should meet the next day to draft for consideration of the Sixteen a list of minimum basic principles. A more detailed account of the meeting of Sixteen is going forward by bag.

KOREA

Following from the Acting Under-Secretary, Begins: In view of the present impasse in the discussions on Korea, we have been giving some thought at the official level to the kind of proposals which might be advanced by our side in order to gain the initiative at the conference. The suggestions we have outlined below may be of some use in connection with list of minimum basic principles which the Group of Nine has been drafting.

2. We think that as a minimum, the ROK must withdraw its insistence (a) that elections be held in North Korea only and (b) that Chinese troops be withdrawn and Norea Korean forces disarmed before elections are held. As the Minister has clearly stated, if these two points are not dropped, the blame for the failure of the Geneva Conference will, in the public mind, rest mainly with the United Nations side.

3. If other members of the Sixteen, including the ROK, agree that direct conversations between North and South Korea on elections might be undertaken on the basis of each side retaining veto rights in the talks and full domestic sovereignty until agreement is reached, then you might find the following suggestions provide a basis for an approach to such conversations.

4. In drafting our suggestions, we have endeavoured to safeguard the position of the ROK and at the same time to meet some of the points contained in the North Korean proposals.

5. At this stage it seems to us that in spite of the United States objections to the North Korean proposals (that they call for an equation of North and South Korea and that they make any general election law subject to a Communist veto), two points must be recognized:

(a) Both North and South Korea must be permitted to participate freely in the negotiations for the establishment of an all-Korean state;

(b) In these negotiations, both North and South Korea must retain the power of veto, since unless they agree, no progress can be made.

6. On the basis of these assumptions, our suggestions are along the following lines:

(1) As a first step towards unification of Korea, arrangements must be made for the holding of free elections throughout Korea under observation in accordance with agreed arrangements.

(2) For this purpose, an Election Commission should be set up with representatives appointed by the ROK Government and North Korea to work out an agreement on election procedures within say six months.

(3) An international Advisory Group on election procedures should be set up to assist the Election Commission with technical advice and good offices as and when requested by the Election Commission. The Advisory Group might consist of representatives of e.g. India, Burma, the Philippines, Switzerland and Czechoslovakia.

(4) In working out the free election procedures, the two sides will proceed on the principle of representation in proportion to population (i.e., constituencies or electoral districts will be approximately equal in size by population).

(5) When agreement is reached on election procedures, the Election Commission will make arrangements for the observation of the elections by setting up an Observer Group which would comprise representatives of North and South Korea and of such other countries as may be mutually agreed upon. The Election Commission will inform the United Nations of the proposed composition of the Observer Group and may ask the United Nations for any technical assistance that may be desired for the holding of the elections or for their observation. Observation of the elections would be carried out on the same basis in all parts of Korea where the elections are held.

(6) The Observer Group would commence operations 21 days prior to the nomination of candidates and would remain in operation until all polls had been declared.

(7) Concurrent with the establishment of an Election Commission, a Liaison Group will be established with representatives of North and South Korea to facilitate negotiations on other matters relating to the unification of the country. This group would have the power to seek the good offices and technical assistance of any international organization, any country or countries as might be mutually agreed upon. This group would also draw up an agreed plan for the phased withdrawal of foreign troops from Korea.

7. The suggestions outlined above seem to us to have the following advantages:

(a) Both North and South Korea will retain complete freedom pending agreement on the form of an all-Korean state and on the procedures to be followed in setting up that state.

(b) Western "interference" in the unification process is kept to a minimum and the main task is left to the Koreans themselves, a feature which should appeal to neutral Asian opinion. We can presumably rely on the ROK to look out for their interests and not to call for the departure of United Nations troops prematurely.

(c) The part suggested for the United Nations is sufficiently inconspicuous to obviate strong objections by the Communists; at the same time the minimum United Nations requirement of free elections under international observation is met. The procedure suggested in item (5) will enable the United Nations to take appropriate action to bring its resolutions into conformity with the joint desires of the North and South Koreans. It will be open for the South Koreans to urge the employment of UNCURK in its present form or a modified form in the observation of the elections.

(d) Since any proposal for the unification of Korea must in the final analysis be acceptable to the North and South Koreans, details concerning the constitution of the unified state or the steps that will have to be taken to transfer authority from the two governments to one can be left to the Koreans to work out.

(e) While the Election Commission is functioning, the Liaison Group can, in addition to working out problems concerned with the transfer of authority and the setting up of an all-Korean Government, deal with minor administrative and economic matters which fall outside the scope of the Military Armistice Commission — e.g., movement of mails, communications, commencement of trade, etc. If, as is probable, the Election Commission becomes deadlocked, the Liaison Group could continue to deal with these matters.

(f) The proposals require no immediate change in existing armistice arrangements.

8. We understand that the Australians are considering proposals of a somewhat similar type to those we have outlined.

9. While we have not thought out the full implications of these ideas and while there are numerous details that would need clarification (e.g., What happens after six months of unsuccessful efforts by the Election Commission? How will the armistice machinery be dismantled?) you may find these suggestions of some assistance in your discussions with other delegations. This telegram should be considered as a departmental working paper for the Minister to use as he sees fit. Ends.

KOREA

During the past week, as the general debate became more and more perfunctory, we became increasingly concerned over the impression of paralysis given by our side as a result of the failure of the Americans to bring the South Koreans around to the acceptance of reasonable proposals. The Americans have been conscious of the growing impatience of most other members of the Sixteen but anxious to forestall any evidence of division in our ranks. In spite of the State Department's assurances last month in Washington that our original position need not be our final position, our inability to speak up while Pyun held the floor has resulted in our becoming increasingly entangled in the ROK position with diminishing chances at extricating ourselves. Although our side has been able with some effect to expose the fallacies of the Communist proposals, we have not been able to say clearly what we do in fact stand for. Meetings of the Sixteen were deteriorating into ROK sounding boards rather than opportunities to work for a meeting of minds, and the United States reluctance to convene such meetings was becoming more marked. The Group of Nine had met only once and the Conference Working Group of British, American and French ceased their joint drafting a week or more ago. From time to time there were encouraging sounds from the United States delegation indicating that if we would only have patience Syngman Rhee might give in a little.

2. There is no longer very serious hope that even the most reasonable proposals which we put forward would be acceptable to the North Koreans, although the South Koreans seem to think there is sufficient danger of the North Koreans double-crossing them in this way, that they are reluctant to risk agreeing to anything but the most conservative offers. What has been concerning us, and many other delegations, is that if we fail to reach an agreement on unification, our side will not appear to have made any very great effort to do so. Furthermore, the proposals we put forward here are proposals we may have to stand by for some years.

3. Before the meeting of the Sixteen on May 13 we called a very informal discussion with officials of the Australian, New Zealand, Belgian and Netherlands delegations and found them much concerned along the same line. The British are unhappy but, like the French, inclined to avoid at almost any cost any difference with the Americans on Korea. The Filipinos are championing at the bit and have angered the South Koreans already. Consideration was given at our small meeting to whether we should seek to put forward concrete proposals to match those of Nam Il or whether we could better minimize our differences with the South Koreans by simply stating the principles, which we consider fundamental and thereby avoiding, if possible, criticizing the South Koreans. The trend of opinion has been in favour of the latter course and Eden has, to some extent, in his speech yesterday in the plenary session taken a public stand on these lines. (Pyun was not happy about the speech and told Eden he could not accept his fourth point — i.e. United Nations supervision of elections by countries not necessarily belligerent.)

4. It was for all the reasons mentioned above that the Minister, as well as Eden and others, persuaded Bedell Smith to call the Sixteen on May 13. The American argument now being given to their impatient allies is that the Communists have so completely repudiated — particularly in Molotov's speech — any United Nations role in a Korean settlement that it is unnecessary for us to worry about stating our own proposals. This argument, however, is not really acceptable. Some concession was made in the Committee of Sixteen by the re-establishment of the Sub-Committee of Nine to try to draft agreed principles "to which we would all agree and from which we would not defect", as Alexis Johnson rather ominously put it.

5. Every effort will be made to reach agreement and to minimize or to blur our difficulties but there must be considerable doubt as to whether a compromise can be reached between positions as difficult as those of the Filipinos and the South Koreans. We may therefore shortly be faced with a difficult decision as to whether it is more important to preserve our unity at all costs or to stand by principles which satisfy our conscience. To break publicly with the South Koreans, particularly if this involved also a difficulty with the Americans, would be something which everyone would want to avoid. The alternative, of course, would put us in an invidious position; our Asian friends and others would accuse us of submitting to American and South Korean dictation. Whatever course we follow would undoubtedly affect future consideration of our policy in maintaining or withdrawing Canadian forces.

KOREA — GENEVA CONFERENCE

This week, the ROK delegation has approached informally a number of other delegations, including ours, in an effort to win support for the South Korean position at this Conference.

2. The ROK Government is now prepared to accept all-Korean elections provided:

- (a) All Chinese Communist troops are withdrawn from North Korea;
- (b) The South Korean electorate approve of the proposal in a plebiscite; and
- (c) UNCURK is the Agency for United Nations supervision.

3. The ROK delegation has also emphasized the importance of our side maintaining a common front i.e., we should all agree with President Rhee.

4. We informed the ROK representative that, in our view, for them to insist that the Chinese must evacuate North Korea before any settlement was, in the absence of a military victory over the Communists, to insist on the impossible. We explained the importance we attached to our taking a stand here on proposals that our own people and the world would recognize as reasonable even though, as we expected, the Communists would not accept them.

5. An account of our interview with Yang the ROK Ambassador in Washington, is contained in our letter No. 3 of May 19† which went forward in yesterday's bag.

Following from Acting Under-Secretary, Begins: We agree entirely that it is essential that our side produce at least a set of principles which can be advanced at the conference and that the American argument, that the Communists have so completely repudiated any United Nations role in a Korean settlement that it is unnecessary for us to worry about stating our own proposals, is not really acceptable.

2. We have particularly in mind the necessity that will face us at the next meeting of the General Assembly to explain and defend the attitude taken by the United Nations side at the Geneva Conference. It will be most desirable that the stand taken by the Sixteen at Geneva should at the General Assembly command the widest possible support including, if possible, the support of those non-participants in the war with neutralist inclinations. In our view this will not be possible if the Geneva Conference is allowed to terminate without a more positive effort by our side to attain a peaceful settlement.

3. In your telegram No. 67 of May 12† you said that General Smith agreed that reasonable proposals might be made by some delegation which would test out the Communists, and that the ROK delegation could then, if necessary, reserve their position in the unlikely event that the Communists would accept them, or simply remain silent if they were not acceptable. We believe that this approach should be fully explored, and that if the Americans pursue this idea with the South Koreans the obstacle which the latter now present to initiative by our side might be removed. The Americans might take the line that due allowance would have to be made for the inability of the South Korean delegation to agree in advance to proposals or principles which will involve constitutional changes in the ROK, and that any agreement reached at Geneva on a settlement or on the machinery to work towards a settlement would, of course, be subject to ratification by the Governments concerned.

4. It is now generally known that none of the other delegations supports the stand taken by the South Koreans against all-Korean elections on reasonable terms. If the ROK succeeds in preventing the presentation of an agreed set of principles or proposals for the peaceful unification of Korea, it will certainly appear that the United Nations side has not striven for a settlement. This will have a very serious effect on public opinion, particularly in those countries which maintain forces in Korea. If a concerted effort to impress this point on the United States were made by like-minded delegations at Geneva, it might assist the Americans in persuading the South Koreans to permit the presentation of an agreed set of principles at the conference without the ROK delegation publicly repudiating them.

5. We believe that an agreed set of principles should meet the following criteria:

(a) they should be reasonable

(b) they should meet the legitimate preoccupations not only of the South but of the North Koreans as well

(c) they should be consistent with previous United Nations resolutions

(d) in the event of the collapse of the Geneva talks, they should be defensible at the next session of the General Assembly

(e) they should provide a basis for renewal of talks at a later date.

6. If the ROK will neither acquiesce in nor keep silent on a set of principles drafted by our side, we believe that these principles should nevertheless be presented to the conference. In these circumstances it should be possible to persuade the ROK to state their reservations in a manner which would minimize the appearance of an open break as far as possible. Similarly, in the presentation of the set of principles agreed to by other delegations on the United Nations side, the point could be made that while we do not share the reservations expressed by the ROK, the position taken by the South Koreans is at least more in accordance with United Nations objectives than that of the Communists.

7. It will be appreciated that the preceding represents departmental views only. We have not consulted any minister. Ends.

KOREA

At yesterday's meeting of the sixteen, Pyun presented the long awaited proposals on which the South Koreans and Americans have been working for some time, in the form of fourteen points, the text of which has been taken to Ottawa by Mr. Pearson.¹⁷

2. Bedell Smith said they would all have preferred to put forward firm proposals on which all sixteen were agreed. This was clearly not possible. It was for this reason that the United States had hoped we could confine our proposals to certain principles rather than present a detailed plan. However Chou En-Lai was to speak in today's plenary and the South Koreans felt that they must at this time produce a counter plan of their own. In these circumstances the United States agreed that Pyun should put forward his proposals then. Bedell Smith was prepared at the first plenary session following to give general support to the proposals and he hoped that other delegates would be able to do the same, or at any rate that they would refrain from criticizing them. There were several aspects of the proposals the United States would have liked to alter. They would have preferred that paragraph 2 state that the elections should take place "in accordance with constitutional process of the ROK Government". They would have preferred to combine paragraphs 12 and 13 on troop withdrawal and "fuzz it up a bit" but there was an advantage in putting forward something from which they could "trade down". He emphasized that these proposals were not hard and fast; they represented a starting position for negotiation and it was possible that if the Communists showed any willingness to negotiate some changes might be made.

3. Pyun insisted that he must speak today and that he was bound by his instructions. He had submitted to his government the American suggestion on paragraph 2 and might be authorized to alter it. The holding of all-Korean elections raised a constitutional problem and they could not promise this without submitting the question to the people. It would have to be submitted to the National Assembly, which would decide whether elections in the south were necessary. Paragraphs 12 and 13 provided a very elastic programme for withdrawal. Some nominal difference was necessary between United Nations and Communist forces. Simultaneous withdrawal could be achieved provided even token United Nations forces remained till the end. He recognized that the proposals would be put forward as South Korean proposals only and that other delegations could, if they wished, make publicly "some small differences". He was sure they were consistent with the general principles other delegations had put forward. If the Communists were willing to discuss these proposals we could talk with them.

4. The Filipinos tried unsuccessfully to persuade Pyun to hold off until the sixteen could agree, a process which would clearly be impossible without further lengthy delays. Eden thought paragraphs 3 to 11 were admirable but was not happy about 2 nor 12 and 13. He preferred the American version of paragraph 2 and thought it better simply to talk about "phased withdrawals on both sides" instead of the specific suggestions in paragraphs 12 and 13. Watt pointed out the impossibility of securing any commitment from his government before the plenary and had some doubts if his government could accept all the proposals but he did not question the right of the South Koreans to ban it. As the inference might be drawn that Pyun's proposals had been approved at this meeting of the sixteen, Watt hoped everything would be done to remove this impression. Bedell Smith suggested Pyun should make clear in his statement that he spoke only for his own government. The Colombians and French wondered if Pyun could at this stage put forward only the first eleven paragraphs, on which we could all agree, but Pyun said the concession of elections in all Korea by his government was dependent upon the amendment of the constitution and the preliminary withdrawal of Chinese troops.

5. Mr. Pearson paid tribute to the Korean and U.S. efforts but said it was difficult to comment in detail without further examination. He questioned the possibility of holding a census and then elections within six months and expressed doubts about paragraph 2. On the question of withdrawal, he recognized the validity of Korean insistence on differentiating in principle between the U.N. and Chinese forces. Nevertheless, we had to produce proposals which would not give the Communists any reason for summary rejection and which would appear sensible to our own people. He suggested the following program which was accepted by the meeting. Pyun should present the proposals as coming from South Korea only and other delegations should refrain from submitting proposals that differed, at least immediately afterwards. Those who felt inclined could give general support to the proposals as a suitable basis of negotiation and might even suggest certain alterations. Thus we could find out whether the Communists wanted to make any concessions. We might suggest either that the South Korean proposals along with the North Korean proposals go to a smaller committee of members of both sides for consideration, or else the committee of sixteen might next week renew its efforts to secure agreement. The advantage of sending the proposals to a negotiating committee would be that we would then appear to have made a serious effort to start negotiations and if these should break off we would find ourselves in a better position in the eyes of the world. Both Bedell Smith and Robertson gave strong support to this proposal. Pyun accepted it in somewhat enigmatic terms.

6. Garcia insisted that differences existed not only on the details of the ROK proposals but on the important principle of withdrawal of troops. Mr. Pearson agreed that there were differences greater than mere details and the position of the Canadian Delegation could only be determined after it was seen to what extent these differences could be ironed out in negotiations.

KOREA

There will be a plenary session on Korea on Wednesday at which Bedell Smith will speak. In his present draft Smith devotes most of his attention to defending the United Nations and re-affirming its decisions. After this, he simply concludes by saying that there must be recognition of the role of the United Nations in helping the Korean people to achieve unification, that there can be no lasting peace or security unless an atmosphere of peace and freedom is provided during the process of unification and political settlement, and that in the light of these principles the United States has studied the ROK proposals and thinks that they meet the basic prerequisites which the vast majority of us here support. He therefore, urges their serious consideration. This is his only reference to the proposals.

2. The Americans are trying to line up as many other countries as possible to say a good word for the South Korean proposals on Wednesday. We understand that so far only Colombia, Turkey and possibly Thailand have agreed. Eden is not anxious to speak but possibly might be persuaded to do so. The Australians, New Zealanders and Belgians are most unlikely to agree, but the Dutch might. In our view, it would be wiser for us not to rush into a statement at this point. We should prefer to study carefully what the Americans say and if possible await some reaction to it. There seems a slight danger that if we all rally too strongly at this point, the Americans, or at least some elements in their delegation, might be tempted to seek to break off the negotiations on this note.

3. The South Koreans have been doing their best to remove any impression that their proposals are intended as a serious basis for negotiations by the provocative way in which they put forward their proposals on Saturday and also by holding a press conference yesterday at which Pyun talked pretty wildly. When pressed, he admitted that he was not speaking for the United Nations on Saturday but claimed that his proposals were in agreement with the principles of the other members of the Sixteen. When asked if South Korea would accept a Neutral Nations Commission composed of non-Communist countries like India, Burma, Switzerland and Sweden, he launched into an unbridled attack on India, which he claimed had never been non-Communist, as well as on Burma and Indonesia.

4. Both the Americans and the South Koreans seem to think that they can dismiss without serious analysis the Chinese proposal for a Neutral Commission and Nam Il's clarification on Saturday about equal representation of North and South in the preliminary Commission, but proportional representation in the resultant legislature. To describe these simply as "a couple of double built-in vetoes", as the Americans have briefed the press, seems hardly good enough in view of the built-in veto in paragraph 2 of the ROK proposals and in view of their specious reasonableness. (Chou En-Lai pretty well convinced Krishna Menon that he believed they and the North Koreans had made very real concessions and asked what more our side wanted). If and when we do make another statement some attention might be devoted to smoking out these latest Communist "concessions".

5. As we are approaching a stage which might be preparatory to the suspension of talks for some months or even years, it seems important that we should not take a strong or at least a categorical stand on principles which in unforeseeable circumstances we might wish to abandon. If in a year's time, for national or international reasons, we are more desperately anxious to unify Korea, it seems pretty certain that

(1) We would have to make use in some way of the technique of a Neutral Nations Commission and that

(2) We would have to accept in fact if not in theory that the United Nations, as at Panmunjom, is negotiating as one belligerent with another belligerent which it has not defeated and must therefore treat as an equal in strength if not in virtue. We ought, therefore, to be careful at this time to defend the United Nations and the validity of its decisions, but without insisting that there can be no alteration in its resolutions and without implying that any settlement would have to be one imposed by the United Nations. The formula, "acceptable to the United Nations", is a safer one as, even if we look upon United Nations merely as one party to the negotiations, proposals would have to be acceptable to the United Nations on that basis. We ought also to be careful not to dismiss in principle the conception of a Neutral Nations Commission, although we could clearly attack the very unsatisfactory proposal by the Chinese for such a Commission.

6. Unless you advise us to the contrary we shall not speak on Wednesday. If we were to come in somewhat later in this phase of the discussions, we might be able at that point to introduce your proposal that the South and North Korean proposals be referred to a working group of some kind. It would certainly be too early to suggest this now.

GENEVA CONFERENCE

I will be speaking in the House tomorrow on the Geneva Conference.

2. The Korean part of my speech will be largely factual and descriptive of what has been going on, with explanation of views on our side and a criticism of plans put forward by the Communists. I expect to state our own principles for a Korean settlement along the lines of the 7 points which we worked out before I left.¹⁸

3. As to the South Korean proposals, I state that while we have doubts about one or two points, e.g., South Korean veto on elections, and Chinese military withdrawal provisions, nevertheless, they would be acceptable as a basis of discussion. I add the view that these proposals should go to a small negotiating committee, though I hold out little chance for success there in view of the Communist attitude toward the United Nations and to the all-Korean Commission.

4. As to the future, I suggest that the conference, in default of any agreement should suspend, and not terminate its work, with a view to looking at the problem again later when conditions may be more propitious. I suggest that it would be wise for the conference to confirm the armistice as desirable and necessary until a peace settlement is possible. I express my view that as a result of the Geneva discussions, renewal of hostilities in Korea will be less likely, and that this is no unimportant result.

5. The rest of my statement will be devoted to the Indo-Chinese side of the conference, and certain general observations on strengthening of security in Southeast Asia. Ends.

I agree that it should not be necessary for you to speak in the plenary debate immediately after Bedell Smith, but I think your intervention should not be postponed for more than a few days.

2. In the meantime, in your discussions with other delegations on our side, it might be worthwhile to urge that the latest Communist "concessions" should not be rejected out of hand and that it would be better tactics on our part to elicit from the Communists more detailed explanations of their proposals as well as some comments on the South Korean proposals. You might also canvass further other delegations on our side on the suggestion that a small working committee be established to study the ROK proposals and the North Korean proposals, too, if that seems desirable. If no other delegation has done so before you speak and if there is general support on our side for the idea, you might include in your speech the suggestion that a working committee be set up to examine the details of the two sets of proposals now before the conference.

3. I agree that it would be most desirable that the Communist proposals be smoked out both in plenary debate and in the working committee if it is established. While I believe it would be unwise to mention at this stage the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission now operating so unsatisfactorily under the Armistice, I think we should query the new proposal for a neutral commission with all the difficulties of the present NNSC in mind. A number of points in this connection could appropriately be raised:

(a) Whom do the Communists propose to have on such commission?

(b) If United Nations belligerents are to be excluded from membership, will this ban apply equally to Communist China? or the USSR — or any other member of the Communist bloc?

(c) Will the number of members be such that deadlock decisions can be avoided? Or are the commission's decisions to be subject to a veto by any member?

4. If further probing shows the Communist proposal for a neutral commission to be completely spurious as an agency to ensure free and fair elections, the United Nations case will rest on much firmer ground than if the Communist proposals are rejected without examination.

5. Questions put to the Communists need not be confined to the newest proposal for a neutral commission, but could also refer to obscurities in the original North Korean proposals — e.g. Is any time limit to be put on the deliberations of the All-Korean Commission in drawing up an electoral law? Are any principles to be prescribed on which the electoral law would be based? Could the Republic of Korea electoral law be used as a basis for drawing up an all-Korean electoral law? What arrangements are to be made if the All-Korean Commission fails to agree on an electoral law? Fundamentally, is the All-Korean Commission to be an interim Gov't or a negotiating forum? If the former, is it envisaged that it should be subject to veto? Can even an interim Gov't function that way?

6. In discussions with delegations on our side, you might find it worthwhile to explore the possibility of using the "principle of non-intervention of foreign states" mentioned by the North Koreans (your telegram No. 92,† para. 9) as a device to overcome anticipated disagreement with the communists on the question of the withdrawal of foreign troops. We have in mind the possibility that if a neutral nations supervisory commission is agreed upon and further progress is blocked by the problem of the withdrawal of foreign troops, agreement might be reached on an arrangement whereby the neutral commission would ensure that foreign troops remaining in Korea at the time of the elections might be insulated from such contacts with the Koreans as might constitute foreign interference in Korea's internal affairs.

Bedell Smith and Eden have had a talk about the next stage in which Eden put up his suggestion for going into restricted session. (As our sessions are already supposed to be secret, the term "restricted session" is now being used to mean, one in which statements are not released to the press and there might presumably be some mutual discussion rather than a series of prepared pronouncements for world consumption). Smith said he had been considering a plan by which the conference would go into a restricted session of some kind and emerge with a set of simple conclusions to which both sides would agree to the effect that:

- (1) Korea should be unified;
- (2) There should be free all-Korean elections;
- (3) Foreign forces should be withdrawn;

(4) We had not been able to reach agreement on the time procedure or method of achieving unification. Smith said he had conceived this plan as a result of Krishna Menon's having said to him that if we couldn't agree, couldn't we agree to disagree. He has now sent this suggestion to Washington but doesn't expect a reply until Dulles returns in a day or so from Duck Island.

2. Eden asked Molotov, before he left on Saturday, what he thought about going into a restricted session to see if we could agree on general principles or if not at least agree to disagree. Molotov didn't commit himself but didn't dissent.

3. It seems quite likely that a decision will be taken in a few days on a new phase of the conference. In the meantime no plenary on Korea is scheduled and there are no speakers on the list. We assume you would not want us to request a plenary unless other delegations also want to speak. Although the members of the United States delegation still talk about the desirability of further speeches along the lines of those on Saturday, Bedell Smith indicated that he wasn't too keen on having any more oratory. Our disposition, therefore, would be to withhold any statement until the procedural position is clarified. The points proposed in your telegram No. 77 of May 28 might be more appropriate in a restricted session. To put them forward now could provoke replies and thereby prolong the present highly unproductive phase of the conference.

KOREA

We called on Prince Wan this afternoon to ask about his proposals which, so far, seem to have attracted much more attention in the American press than in Geneva.

2. Wan said that he had not made any proposals; he had been talking of possibilities with newspapermen who had reported only part of his ideas. As a co-chairman he was much concerned over the failure to hold meetings or to get on with the Korean discussion. In his view we should hold a meeting of the sixteen as soon as possible and decide to seek agreement at the next plenary meeting, on the holding of restricted sessions of the seven delegations, to study the proposals which had been made. He assumed that agreement on unification would not be possible but thought that when this became evident a plenary session might appoint the seven as a continuing commission which could go on working quietly in Geneva after the press correspondents had departed. He was not sanguine about the prospects of agreement in the Commission but he thought this was one method of preventing debate on the subject re-opening in either a special session of the Assembly or in the autumn. As for the commission it could carry on or peter out unostentatiously when the cost was clear.

3. He told us also of a talk he had just had with Pyun who insisted on the conference breaking up on the issue of his fourteen points. Wan told Pyun that if the conference broke up on that issue he could not count on Thailand's support. It was necessary that these proposals be studied and looked into in the conference because there were aspects on which he was doubtful. He reminded Pyun that his fourteen points would not be easily accepted in the Assembly and the United Nations would wish to continue discussing a settlement. Pyun said the ROK was not a member of the United Nations and the United Nations could not impose a settlement upon them, an argument which is peculiarly significant in the light of the American insistence that we should break up on the issue of the authority of the United Nations.

4. Wan told us that Robertson had come to see him that morning, to say that he could not accept Wan's proposals for a commission. He told him of Dulles' instructions to break up the conference on the United Nations issue and said that he was prepared to have the conference go into restricted sessions but only in order to put the question to the Communists of whether or not they accepted the authority of the United Nations. If they did not then the conference would break up on that note. If satisfactory agreement could be reached on that point Robertson was prepared to go ahead with Wan's proposed commission.

5. Wan who is naturally an enthusiast for United Nations, seemed rather woolly on this point and said he had agreed to go along with Robertson on the supremacy of the United Nations. We said that we thought everything depended on the form in which this question was put. If we expected that the Communists would repudiate their aggression and accept the decisions of the United Nations as binding on them, it was quite futile to hold restricted sessions for this purpose since Wan said he thought they would merely be asked to confirm their faith in collective security. We pointed out that, whereas the Communists had denied the legality of United Nations action in Korea, they had never questioned the Charter of the United Nations or the principle of collective security. He said he had pointed this out to Robertson who was apparently not impressed (Johnson told us this morning that they thought the Communists were seeking to discredit the Charter and the whole principle of the United Nations). We asked Wan what terms of reference could be used by the plenary session in calling the restricted sessions into action. The conference could hardly ask for restricted sessions for the avowed purpose of securing a Communist profession of faith in the United Nations. We should have to call upon the restricted sessions to see if negotiation was possible on the basis of proposals already made. He accepted this argument which seemed to confirm some of his own doubts.

6. Prince Wan had to leave before we could carry him on to the subject of the Thai appeal to the United Nations but he said he was shortly seeing Krishna Menon who arrived back in Geneva this morning partly, it would seem, as a result of a message Wan sent to him in London.

Following from Acting Under-Secretary, Begins: We have been somewhat disturbed to note the growing evidence that the United States delegation in Geneva has fairly categorical instructions to break up the conference on the issue of United Nations authority. There does not appear to be a clear idea as to what exactly is meant by "United Nations authority", and we are very doubtful about the reaction in the world at large and in the United Nations General Assembly in particular if the conference is broken off abruptly by our side on what does not appear to us to be a clear and defensible issue.

2. There seems to be a considerable spread in the various views as to how far the principle of international supervision of elections should be carried. There is the ROK view that elections should be supervised by UNCURK as presently constituted. Then there is the view expressed by Mr. Eden in his speech of May 13, that elections should be supervised "under the auspices of the United Nations", the countries providing the supervision not necessarily being those which have taken part in the war. My own approach, as expressed in my statement to Parliament, is close to this and would provide for supervision by an international agency acceptable to the United Nations consisting of nations which do not belong to the communist bloc and which did not participate in military operations in Korea. There are no doubt other interpretations of just what the role of the United Nations should be in the supervision of elections, but I would be surprised if the majority of delegations on our side would take as rigid a position as seems to be implied in the United States instructions to their delegation in Geneva.

3. I still feel that it is important to elicit from the Communists some indication as to their ideas for a neutral supervisory commission. If, as we suspect, it is to be on the pattern of the NNSC under the armistice, we will be able to demonstrate clearly its unacceptability and our own position will be the stronger.

4. I would be grateful if you would ascertain from the United States delegation a clearer definition of the principle on which they would like to see the conference broken off. You might express to them our apprehensions about breaking off the talks prematurely when the issue as between our side and the communists is not as clear, in the light of the various statements made by our side, as the Americans would appear to believe. To demand that the communists accept the authority of the United Nations and to break off the conference if they refuse would seem to us to leave the United Nations side at a considerable disadvantage from a public relations point of view, particularly as this approach bears little relation to the fact that the United Nations must, for practical purposes, treat with the communists as an equal in strength if not in virtue.

5. Your telegram No. 128 just received. Minister not immediately available but hope to see him early tomorrow morning.

We saw Alexis Johnson yesterday and he began by reading to us, the instruction that had just been received from Dulles. It was a long rhetorical instruction in which he argued that it would be best that the negotiations should be broken off on a clear-cut issue and that this issue should be the position of the United Nations. The people of the world would expect us to take a lofty stand on this matter and not allow the authority of the United Nations to be questioned. While we did not challenge Dulles' argument we did point out that the issue of the United Nations might not be entirely clear-cut and that if there was to be a break on this issue we ought to think through clearly what we were doing.

2. Johnson referred to Bedell Smith's proposals for ending the conference with an agreement to disagree (our telegram No. 120 of June 1) with which he himself was clearly not in sympathy. He indicated that they did not want to end the conference in any such joint communiqué with the Communists. While there may undoubtedly be internal political reasons for this position, Johnson did seem to have a valid argument, when he said that it would give a false impression to announce that we were all agreed on free elections and the withdrawal of troops when there were such fundamental differences between our interpretations of these principles.

3. We pointed out that it was because of these differences that we thought that the proposals should all be submitted to a restricted group. In accordance with the instructions in your telegram No. 77 of May 28 we put forward the advantages of referring proposals to a body in which negotiation would be more effective. Johnson clearly doesn't think negotiation in a restricted session is urgently necessary but said that he would not mind another restricted session to look into the possibility of further negotiation. By restricted session he meant a secret meeting of the seven previously designated for such a purpose, that is the four sponsoring powers,

China and the two Koreas. When we asked him if he would have in mind only one session or whether he would be prepared to look upon this as a beginning of a negotiation, if that proved possible, he said that they would naturally be prepared to pursue discussions in this form if the prospects looked good but they would want to cut them off if no further agreement looked likely. If this could be undertaken in the right spirit we think it might be the most practical means of achieving the negotiating phase which you had in mind. Johnson seemed willing to pursue this idea and suggested that we discuss it among ourselves with a view possibly to having a meeting of the sixteen on Friday. He thought there should be a plenary session to convoke the restricted session. In discussing the timetable at a later stage he suggested that the restricted session might then report back to the plenary where there could be final statements. He dropped the hint that we might look forward to such a plenary at the end of next week. It seems to us highly unlikely, however, that at the rate at which Korean proceedings move we could wind up this negotiating phase in less than a week, unless the Americans are not inclined to take the process of negotiation seriously. If we all stick to our present positions — and there is no indication that the ROK will move an inch — the negotiations might not take long but it is by no means unlikely that the Communists will face us with further spurious but attractive concessions which we should have to debate.

4. We told Johnson that we recognized that the most important thing in Geneva was the satisfactory conduct of the Indo-China negotiations and although we were impatient to finish the Korea talks we did not want to insist on a policy which would make the other proceedings more difficult. He indicated that they would be quite happy to finish the Korean discussions as soon as it was possible to do so satisfactorily, regardless of what was going on over Indo-China.

5. Although Johnson was opposed to concluding the conference with any joint communiqué with the Communists he did think the conference might be suspended sine die. This is the first time any of the Americans have entertained this suggestion and we indicated that it was in accordance with your thinking. Johnson thought that this kind of suspension should be indefinite, leaving things so that the question could be taken up again by this conference or possibly by another conference or in the Assembly. When we mentioned the danger of ending the conference in such a way that Mrs. Pandit might find it necessary to call a special session of the General Assembly immediately, he said that they had threshed this out a good deal and did not think that anything we could do here would prevent the United Nations from convening and discussing Korea.

6. While the prospects of getting on to a negotiating stage look a little better there is no assurance that Johnson's not exactly enthusiastic support of this procedure will prevail or last the night. Furthermore, it is quite possible that a negotiating phase might be accepted by the Americans with the intention of securing a quick break on the issue which Dulles has prescribed.

CONFIDENTIAL. MOST IMMEDIATE.

KOREA

There will probably be a meeting of the Sixteen on Friday morning at which the Americans are expected to present a program for restricted sessions with the intention of forcing the conference to break on the issue of the authority of the United Nations. We have grave misgivings shared by other Commonwealth delegations as to whether this is a clear cut issue on which to break and as a result of our prodding the United States delegation for a clear definition of the position they wish to establish we doubt if the Americans here or in Washington have thought this question through very clearly. They are bound by Dulles' instructions which are fervent but imprecise and it seems clear that if they are to be altered in any way this would have to be done by raising the matter in Washington.

2. Our grave doubts about the procedure arise from the following reasons:

(a) We would naturally reject most strongly the Communist charges that the United Nations acted illegally and has committed aggression but this hardly seems to be good ground on which to break the negotiations, as the holding of different views on the subject by both parties does not really stand in the way of settlement.

(b) Our present position vis-à-vis the United Nations is ambivalent and better not too carefully defined. We would not want to be drawn into a denial of the right of the United Nations to settle disputes anywhere but the brute fact of our present situation is that the United Nations is incapable of imposing a settlement and we recognized that fact when we began negotiations at Panmunjom. It was the Americans in particular who insisted on this conception during last summer's Assembly when they rejected a round-table conference for one at which the two sides would sit opposite each other. To take a perfectionist stand on United Nations supremacy at a conference with such dubious parentage as this one could prove hypocritical. We have come here and sat down beside the Communists for the purpose of negotiating with them. There is no reason for shame in what we have done as it has been in accordance with our Canadian conception of the United Nations as a flexible instrument providing opportunities of various kinds for hammering out solutions but it is harder to justify in the fundamentalist terms which Dulles seems to have in mind.

(c) If the intention is to force the Communists to profess their faith in the United Nations and its acts and thereby as they would see it admit their aggression then the exercise is just silly. The Communists have come to Geneva not to Canoosa.

(d) The Communist attacks on the alleged presumptions of the United Nations side (which incidentally they never refer to as such) are coupled with the repeated argument that we cannot impose by diplomacy what we could not impose by force of arms. This is not an argument we can afford to recognize in public but it unhappily describes the facts as they exist. Our insistence on the authority of the United Nations means simply to them that we maintain our right to impose a settlement on them and this of course they would never accept unless the whole balance of power in Asia shifted.

(e) None of the Communist delegations has attacked the Charter or the principle of collective security but has merely maintained, that in the case of Korea, the United Nations acted illegally. We must ask ourselves the question whether we want to force them into extreme positions. It would seem particularly unwise at the present moment to force the Russians into an attack on the United Nations and its Charter.

(f) It is of course a debatable point but there might well be some inconsistency between an insistence on the recognition by the Peking government of the authority of the United Nations and the refusal to admit them. At any rate it is a question that is better left untouched at the moment.

(g) In choosing an issue on which to break, we must ask ourselves if it really is an issue which we would insist upon indefinitely. It seems to us doubtful whether, if at some future date, the Communists were prepared to withdraw their forces before an election and allow for international supervision under conditions we considered safe and satisfactory, we would refuse to accept their terms simply because they refused to acknowledge the moral authority of United Nations in general terms.

(h) If we broke on this issue it would possibly, as time passed, become simplified in the public eye into whether supervision was to be by an international body of some kind or whether it would be by UNCURK. This is hardly consistent with your more flexible principle as stated in the House of Commons. It is contrary, furthermore, to the precedent for Germany put forward by the Allies at Berlin and swallowed with no trouble by the public.

(i) We have grave doubts whether the ROK would accept the right of the United Nations to impose a settlement on them. If they would, then the United Nations Assembly would have a much easier mandate.

3. In our view there are stronger and more clear-cut issues on which to break. Surely it would be better to refuse to go on unless the Communists revise their preposterous proposals on elections and the withdrawal of troops. These would seem more reasonable in the eyes of the public and they are the issues on which we cannot compromise. They are issues, however, which would have to come up during an honest effort to probe the various proposals in restricted sessions. To go into these sessions with a preordained program for breaking them up, seems neither practical nor honest. There is every likelihood that our intention would become known to the press. If we could go into restricted session for the purpose of exploring the proposals and if the United Nations issue should without any manoeuvring on our part arise in some form in which a breakoff would be justifiable then we should be prepared to look at this at the time. In our view a break is more likely to be justifiable on one of the other issues but we do not think that this issue should be prescribed in advance. Furthermore, we think it a gross underestimate of Communist skill to imagine that we can jockey them into the right position on this issue in short order.

4. The United States delegation have now conceived the idea that in the absence of any agreed conclusion to the conference the sixteen countries would draw up a report to the United Nations either to the Secretary-General or to the Assembly. Some such formality might well be required but unless it is in pretty general terms or is merely in the nature of an historical record it will be very difficult to secure agreement. Possibly it might be best to hand over to the Secretary-General the records of the meetings, with an offer to try again if requested so to do or if the circumstances seemed more opportune.

5. Unless we receive instructions from you before Friday's meeting we propose to reserve our position as subject to instructions on the question of the United Nations issue. We propose to express some misgivings and press for a clarification of the issue before we proceed further. However, if the Sixteen propose restricted sessions of the seven with a general mandate to look into the proposals or the possibility of further agreement we would accept this as being in accordance with your instructions.

We agree that it would not be desirable for you to request a plenary unless other delegations also want to speak, and that the points suggested in our telegram No. 77 of May 28 might just as if not more suitably be made in a restricted session if there is to be no plenary debate for the time being.

2. As the Korean discussions move towards termination it is important that they be brought to an end in a manner satisfactory to our side. We believe that until the Communist proposal for a neutral supervisory commission is fully examined and exposed, there may be some confusion in the public mind on the question of international supervision of elections. The relative success of the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission has entirely obscured the failure of the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission under the Armistice, and if the talks are broken off too hastily it might give the impression that the United Nations side had given no real consideration to the Communist "concessions" in proposing a neutral commission to supervise the elections. For this reason we believe that the Communist proposal for a neutral commission should be probed so that if the talks are to be broken off on the question of international supervision of elections, the issue will be clear cut and there will be no question as to which side is being reasonable.

3. If we are moving in the direction of agreeing to disagree, we believe it is important that the Armistice Agreement should be confirmed in some way before the conference breaks up, so that we may be assured of as much stability in Korea as we have had during the past ten months.

4. In this connection you may be aware that the State Department is considering a recommendation from CINCUNC that the Swiss and Swedish members of the NNSC be invited to withdraw so that the Czech and Polish members could be excluded from South Korea on the grounds that the Commission was inoperative. We believe that a unilateral withdrawal by the Swiss and Swedish members might have unfortunate effects on the stability of the armistice, and that it would be far better to keep the commission in existence on a formal basis, applying whatever retaliatory restrictions to its operations as might be considered necessary from a military point of view.

5. To ensure that a confirmation of the armistice would not be regarded by the South Koreans as giving the division of the country a permanent character, it might be worthwhile as I suggested in my statement to Parliament, to suspend the conference rather than terminate it, leaving the way open for a resumption of talks when circumstances are more favourable.

6. I would be grateful if you would discuss these ideas with other delegations on our side.

Bedell Smith opened this morning's meeting of the Group of Sixteen with a summary of United States views. Out of the general debate had emerged a clear cut issue which would command the support of public opinion — that was the position of the United Nations. There was little to gain and much to lose if we permitted the discussions on Korea to hang on and thus submerge this fundamental issue. He then read extracts from his instructions from Dulles (our telegram No. 127 of June 3); he solicited discussion of the United States position so that at the plenary session of June 5 (arranged at the request of Nam Il of North Korea) we would have a common position to which we might adhere.

2. Garcia of the Philippines made here his sole contribution to the discussion by saying that we must stand on the principle of maintaining the authority of the United Nations.

3. Smith then turned to the matter of tactics. He said that a tomorrow's plenary Nam Il would probably make some gesture towards the United Nations to throw off balance our attempts to bring the United Nations principle to a head. He doubted the sincerity of any such gesture. He hoped that some delegation might be ready to speak. Next Monday there should be a restricted meeting of the seven, i.e., the Big Four, China and the two Koreas, where our side would pose the following question to the Communists:

Were they ready to have Korea unified under free elections supervised by the United Nations. If they replied in the negative or signified spurious partial acquiescence, it would be clear that at this time there was no basis for further negotiations in good faith. Our representatives in the group would then report to the sixteen and thereafter a similar report would be made in plenary thus making it unnecessary for further conference meetings on Korea. The plenary session should take place towards the end of next week to permit delegates to consult their governments.

4. Eden said that the Communists had no intention of permitting free elections. While upholding what the United Nations has done in Korea we should go as far as we could to establish that we believed in free elections. This was an issue which could be understood by the public concerned and he was anxious that we should keep it parallel with the United Nations issue. Smith then said that his question to the Communists would cover this point.

5. Pyun next said that his government thought all statements should be made in plenary. He would ask for authority to attend the restricted meeting on Monday but if this did not arrive we would "all" be in an embarrassing situation. Bidault stressed the importance of precedents and said we should not accept "mixed commissions" in Germany, Korea or Indo-China. Ronning expressed approval for the holding of a restricted session. He favoured the fourteen point ROK proposals as a basis for negotiations and had understood that they had been put forward for that purpose. Through negotiations he thought we could get an issue on which we would be justified in breaking up the conference. He supported Eden's point on elections and said that before we came here we knew that the Communists rejected the United Nations role in Korea. Since the General Assembly agreed to the convening of a Korean Conference regardless of Communist objections to the United Nations we would be unhappy if this Conference were now broken off on this issue. A restricted session would give an opportunity for the Communists to be smoked out concerning their ill conceived proposals. Then they could be forced to break off on our reasonable proposals.

6. The Netherlands representative said the Conference should be broken off soon and that it was essential for us to maintain the authority of the United Nations. A restricted session was necessary from the point of view of public opinion since there had been no true negotiations. The question which Smith wanted put was the right one. The Belgian representative associated himself with these remarks.

7. Watt for Australia said that however the conference broke up the Armistice Agreement must remain in force. The arrangement for meeting on Saturday and Monday was a little tight. Any proposals made by Nam Il tomorrow would have to be considered by governments and this might make it desirable for the restricted meeting to be held somewhat later. He was interested in what questions should be asked of the Communists in the restricted session. All of us favoured upholding the authority of the United Nations but hoped that our adherence to the cause of free elections could be brought out properly in further meetings.

8. The Colombian representative raised the question of a report to the United Nations on the failure of the conference. Experience indicated the importance of our agreeing on a report whether it should require the Assembly being convened and the tactics we should employ at the Assembly. Secretary General Kural suggested that after the restricted session a meeting of the sixteen might decide policy for the last plenary and also the question of a report.

9. Smith then said that the two principles of free elections and the position of the United Nations might march side by side although the latter was more important in the eyes of the United States. Eden intervened to say that while it was very important that there should be United Nations supervision of elections it was more important that the elections should be free.

10. The Turkish representative expressed general agreement with all proposals. If Nam Il said anything worthwhile on Saturday we should try to find out from the Communists their exact aims through a restricted session. Then the results of these enquiries might be reported to the sixteen and a decision taken.

11. Ronning spoke again on the importance of free elections as an issue. If the Communists would accept the principle of free elections with the requisite machinery they would entail then we could afford to ignore their attacks on the United Nations. McIntosh of New Zealand approved this line of reasoning and stressed the desirability of our side going through the motions of real negotiations.

12. Smith said that the United States had not sent troops to Korea to protect free elections but to uphold the authority of the United Nations. The free elections issue was important but not that important. Ronning said that we attached so much importance to free elections because they were essential to the achievement of the United Nations objectives for Korea.

13. Bidault argued that if we had to break off the conference — action which would inevitably have unfortunate consequences on Indo-China — we might make a public statement which would include both views relating to the United Nations and free elections. Prince Wan supported this idea and said that differences among delegations seemed to be those of emphasis and detail.

14. Pyun then said that free elections could not be separated from United Nations observation and supervision of such elections although some delegations seemed to want to make the separation. Bidault agreed with him and said that since the United States had carried the main burden in Korea and had adopted a firm attitude he would acquiesce in that attitude. The Greek representative gave full support to the United States position also.

15. Smith said that we were agreed on two principles and so long as we kept them side by side we could each give the emphasis to the one which appealed most to our public opinion. Ronning said that our only reservation to the last part of his question was that you were on record as favouring international supervision acceptable to the United Nations. We did not object to his putting his question to Communists since it should bring a reply on an issue we considered very important. Smith said nothing further but it was clear that he was not happy about our formula.

It is clear from this morning's meeting of the 16 and subsequent discussions with the Americans that the latter are not prepared to consider objectively and unemotionally any qualifications of the issue of the authority of the United Nations to settle the Korean question. While they deny that they are insisting on imposing a settlement on the North Koreans they react with a great deal of rhetoric to any interpretation of the United Nations role that leads to any other conclusion. Above all, they refuse to face squarely the realities of the situation in which we find ourselves and which we accepted when we started negotiations with the "other side". After the meeting, Bedell Smith with some choler said that you had given him clearly to understand before you left that you believed the basis issue was the authority of the United Nations. The trouble is, of course, that the Americans will not recognise that this is an issue with which one agrees or disagrees depending upon how it is defined. Ronning made clear to Smith that he was acting under your instructions. He had in fact quoted from your statement in the House of Commons during this meeting.

2. There is no future in any attempt to meet this issue head on. The other Commonwealth delegates agree entirely with us but the other members of the 16 are clearly not prepared to differ with the Americans. Bidault tried skilfully to propose a compromise but concluded by saying that the United States had provided the largest effort in Korea and he was not disposed therefore to oppose them in this issue. Eden who had left the meeting before our differences with the Americans came out very clearly is frankly not prepared to clash with the Americans on Korea. He did, however, provide a formula for attacking this question sideways which seems to offer our best method of procedure. He is prepared to let the Americans have their United Nations issue provided they will recognise the parallel importance of the issue of free elections and Smith seems prepared to accept this if we will not question the sanctity of his issue.

3. We now have the Americans and all except the R.O.K. agreeing to go into a restricted session or sessions to look into the proposals before the conference and report back to the 16 — this much has been achieved. The question as to what issue we break on will inevitably be dictated to some extent at least by the course of the discussions and the United Nations issue may not seem as clear to the Americans after the Communists have replied. We can count on the United Kingdom and possibly France to seek to draw out the Communists on parallel issues on which a break would be more effective. Our hope might be, therefore, to overshadow one bad issue with several good ones. In the meantime, if you agree our best policy would seem to be to continue the talks we have had with the United States delegate on this point for the past few days hoping to persuade them of the validity of our fears while at the same time avoiding any clear cut opposition to what they are heaven bent at the moment to pursue so that our influence might be exerted more effectively at a later stage.

4. As it is not very easy to get the Americans here to listen calmly to our heresies it might be helpful if the Embassy in Washington could put these arguments to the State Department in order at least to make clear that they are put forward in good faith and to correct what might be somewhat inaccurate versions reaching them from Geneva.

KOREA

Following from Acting Under-Secretary, Begins: We would be grateful if you would take up with the State Department at the earliest opportunity and in the manner which you consider most suitable the question of the next phase of the Geneva Conference on Korea. As should be clear from our telegrams under reference, we (and apparently other Commonwealth Governments as well) are not at all happy about the scheme to break off the conference so early and to do it on the issue of United Nations authority. It would be appreciated if you would express our apprehensions on this score.

2. The essential need when the break-up comes and the Conference on Korea collapses is that our position should be unassailable. It would seem to me therefore that three principal arguments should be used with the State Department. The first is that the issue of United Nations authority is not clear. People would not understand that we broke on election supervision by the United Nations unless the other side had been shown to refuse not only United Nations supervision but a balanced, truly neutral supervision, or some other clear cut breaking point has been found. Second is the question of timing. The Conference has gone on for only six weeks and much time has been spent on the crucial Indochina negotiations. A precipitated break would leave doubt that every possible avenue of negotiation has been explored in good faith. It took a long time to achieve an armistice in Korea, but time and patience which are of the essence in negotiation with the Communists did finally bear fruit. The third which is another aspect of the second and re-enforces it is that a break at this stage when the principals have to remain in Geneva in any case and before the parallel negotiation on Indochina has settled down might well endanger its progress. It would be difficult to dispel the impression in the public mind that our break on Korea had been fatal to the achievement in the parallel conference of at least a cease-fire.

3. You may also wish to use such arguments from EX-954 and EX-955 as you may find suitable, and endeavour to get a clearer picture of what the instructions to the United States Delegation mean with respect to the issue of United Nations authority. In making your approach you might bear in mind the comment in paragraph 1 of EX-955, that if the United States instructions are to be altered in any way, this will have to be done by raising the matter in Washington.

4. We appreciate that the United States position is affected to a considerable extent by the intractability of the ROK. You might point out, however, that if the United Nations side becomes infected with South Korean intransigence, it may have a very serious effect on public opinion not only in our own countries but in other United Nations countries which have been watching (with their own security in mind) this first collective effort at peace making. It seems to us that the collective effort made under the aegis of the United Nations to repel aggression has important international psychological aspects which must be taken into account as well as the Korean locus of that action. In the countries which have only limited interests in northeast Asia, particularly, the prestige of the United Nations might be seriously damaged if the Organization were forced to take positions which seemed unreasonable or unrealistic merely to maintain solidarity with the ROK.

5. In our view, we should now go into restricted session at Geneva with the honest intention of exploring the various proposals now before the Conference. As the negotiations proceed, it should not be difficult to develop positions on which our side can take a stand that will command the full sympathy of the public, not only in those countries with forces in Korea but in other United Nations countries as well. If the Communists find such positions unacceptable, the collapse of the conference and the continued division of Korea will be shown unmistakably as their responsibility. Ends.

There is some indication that our arguments on the United Nations issue are having a delayed effect. Alexis Johnson has now admitted to Dennis Allen that their question as formulated was not satisfactory and they were trying to restate it. Allen had pointed out that under the present formula the Communists could simply accept "international" supervision and leave us to justify breaking off the negotiations on the differences between United Nations and international supervision. Bedell Smith told Eden yesterday afternoon he recognized that both questions, the authority of the United Nations and the question of free elections, are important and we could each emphasise the one which seemed most important to our public. However, he urged that if we emphasised free elections we should also stand firmly on the United Nations issue.

Following from Acting Under-Secretary, Begins: Since we expect to make strong representations on economic questions in Washington this week, the Embassy in Washington has been doubtful on over all policy grounds of the advisability of duplicating there the good fight which you are carrying on at Geneva, and, we are glad to note from your last telegram under reference, not entirely without success. I have agreed to the Embassy withholding its fire until they receive further instructions.

2. The need to sound the warnings you have made is further shown by Hamilton's report in today's New York Times of the Molotov "further examination" "reasonableness" at yesterday's plenary.

3. It appears unlikely that there will be meetings of the 16 or plenary for some days, and we are not party to the restricted sessions, should any be held tomorrow or Tuesday. The Minister will be absent until Tuesday noon and cannot conveniently be reached by phone, but I shall have a word with him as soon as possible and will advise you and Washington further.

4. I agree with you that there is no future in any attempt to meet the issue head-on. Molotov's approach, however, seems to prove us right; "further examination" and smoking out of his proposals would appear now to be even more desirable before a break is made.

5. I would therefore suggest that, until you hear further from us, you withhold expounding the views on which we were agreed beforehand, without indicating that your instructions have or may be changed.

Participants of Geneva Conference have agreed upon following fundamental principles relating to peaceful settlement of Korean problem:

1. With a view to unifying Korea and establishing united, independent, and democratic Korean state free elections shall be held throughout territory of Korea. The elections shall be held within six months after conclusion of present agreement. The elections shall be conducted on basis of secret ballot and universal suffrage. Representation in all Korea legislature shall be in proportion to population of the entire Korea.

2. With a view to prepare and conduct free all Korean elections and to facilitate rapprochement between Democratic Peoples Republic of Korea and Republic of Korea an all Korean body shall be set up composed of representatives of Democratic Peoples Republic of Korea and Republic of Korea. The composition and tasks of this body shall be subject of further examination.

3. All foreign forces shall be withdrawn from Korea within specified periods. Periods and phases for withdrawal of all foreign forces from North and South Korea prior to holding of free all Korean elections shall be examined further.

4. It shall be resolved that an appropriate international commission shall be set up to supervise holding of free all Korean elections. The composition of this supervisory commission shall be examined further.

5. Recognizing the importance of preventing any violation of peace in Korea it shall be deemed necessary for powers most directly concerned in maintenance of peace in Far East to assume obligations to ensure Korea's peaceful development which would facilitate settlement of problem of Korea's national unification. The question of the powers which are to assume obligations regarding ensuring of Korea's peaceful development and of nature of these obligations shall be subject of further examination. Text ends.

Saturday's [plenary] meeting has complicated the program for satisfactorily breaking off the Korean Conference. Even before Molotov made his proposals Nam Il and Chou En-Lai had put on fairly reasonable performances although they did help us in several important respects. Nam Il's emphasis on leaving the electoral processes to the Koreans without interference from outside further clarified opposition which we can criticize with some force. Chou's proposal that the N.N.R.C. should take over the supervisory job for unifying Korea is a good one to attack. Bedell Smith, probably to some extent as a result of Commonwealth representations, did concentrate on the issues we all find important and stated the issue of United Nations authority sufficiently imprecisely to keep us off a hook. His attack on the North Korean proposals for a supervisory commission was in accordance with the views put forward in your telegram No. 84 of June 4.

2. These gains however were overshadowed by Molotov's proposals preceded by a reasonable exposition quite out of keeping with the sharp propaganda line that followed. He has probed the weaknesses of the sixteen so accurately that one is almost led to speculate on the efficiency of Soviet intelligence in Geneva. While his propaganda attack was directed at the United States, on several occasions he cited Commonwealth spokesmen with approval. Throughout the afternoon the Communist spokesman seemed to be deliberately making concessions for the benefit of those of us who have doubts about South Korean and American policy thereby, of course, making our position all the more difficult.

3. As you said in para 4 of your telegram No. 90 of June 6, we must give careful consideration to Molotov's proposals at least in order to smoke them out before we can break off. Pyun rejected them immediately as unworthy of consideration and Bedell Smith ignored rather than rejected them. His enigmatic final statement that the United States was preparing to rest its case which he read from a hastily scrawled note left an unfortunate impression. Bentinck's position seemed to us much better in that he continued to attack the unacceptable features of the Communist proposals but said he would study the Soviet resolution with care.

4. It is not true as Molotov implied that his proposals represent principles on which we have all agreed even though we differ in details. No one on our side has accepted the principle of an all-Korean commission. We have not agreed on the withdrawal of all foreign forces prior to the holding of elections. We have not agreed on the establishment of "an international commission" nor have we accepted the principle of obligations to be assumed by the interested powers.

5. However, although the Communist proposals on all these matters have been unacceptable in the form in which they have been put it cannot be said that they are all patently unreasonable as stated in terms of general principles in Molotov's resolution. Even the idea of an all-Korean commission could, if properly constituted and given the right functions, serve a useful purpose and might well be essential in preparing for elections in a divided country. (The built-in veto the Americans talk so much about is built in to the facts of the situation and not merely into the Communist proposals). Although you have called for withdrawal of forces by stages which would leave some troops in Korea at the time of the elections it is not easy to argue against staged withdrawals before elections as Molotov has put it. As for the question of an international or United Nations commission we have not been prepared to make an issue of this provided the composition is satisfactory. The proposal for obligations or guarantees to be assumed by interested powers is one for which the Communists seem to have questionable intentions but we have thought that if there is ever to be a unified Korea it must be protected from interference by some kind of mutual undertaking by the great powers.

6. Under these circumstances, the most sensible thing would be to consider Molotov's resolution as a basis for discussion with a view to accepting it with some amendments as the first stage of a settlement. Having accepted it with modifications or explanations we could then decide whether to continue discussing the details now or whether this might be the note on which to suspend the Conference to be resumed at a more propitious moment. (Although Molotov's proposals are complicated by being somewhat more specific, tactically they resemble Bedell Smith's abortive suggestions described in our telegram No. 120 of June 1st.)

7. The inescapable fact which we must face, however, is that there is no possibility of seriously examining Molotov's proposals unless we are prepared to make an open break with the ROK, and probably also the U.S. — a break which would serve no useful purpose as we are no more able to impose a settlement on the ROK than on the North Koreans. A debate on the proposals would probably serve only to show up the intransigence of the ROK, while the Communists were able to retreat behind reasonable general principles, the ugly details of which they would postpone to a later stage. We are, in fact, increasingly wondering whether we ought to press too hard for negotiations when there cannot be any negotiations. The ROK have no intention of negotiating any point whatsoever, and Bedell Smith told Ranning on Saturday that although he could not say so out loud, the fact was that so long as Syngman Rhee lived there could be no unification of Korea. As a country participating in this Conference we find ourselves in a totally false position because it does not in the end matter at all what we think is right. We have not even a vote in the Conference because there is no voting.

8. We seem to be confronted with a choice between unsatisfactory alternatives. We could pact up and go home, announcing our disagreement with the ROK. Such a step would relieve our feelings and put the record straight, but would serve no other useful purpose except possibly to strengthen our relations with the Colombo powers and give us an excuse to withdraw our forces. It would certainly have a damaging effect on the more important phase of the Geneva Conference. The alternative is for our side to try to break off the Conference as soon as possible in a way which can hardly be satisfactory but which would be the least unsatisfactory. This might be done by picking up the argument that any expression of agreement such as that contained in Molotov's resolution would give a dishonest impression to the world of agreement where there is no agreement. If the Communists want to hide behind general principles and ignore the details we should force them to talk about details first, insisting that so long as the details of the Communist proposals are so utterly unacceptable we could not honestly talk about agreement in principle. In this way we could go on forcing them to talk about the terms of free elections which would, we hope, impress the world as unacceptable. By concentrating on these details we might also divert the U.S. from its holy theme of the U.N. In order not to be accused of rejecting reasonable proposals we might even go so far as to say to Molotov that we could possibly accept his resolution if his colleagues would first make the necessary changes in their detailed suggestions to enable us to believe that we really are agreed on principles.

9. We shall continue to urge the necessity of suspending rather than terminating the Conference although it might be worth considering whether we do want to become involved again in a Conference in which we have responsibility without power and are so thoroughly cased by built-in vetoes on all sides.

KOREA

The Sixteen found themselves in general agreement this morning on tactics. Bedell Smith began by reporting on his dinner last night with Molotov at which he had found him utterly amiable and agreeable but refusing to budge from the position on supervisory commissions for both Korea and Indo-China that they should be composed on a fifty-fifty basis of theirs and ours. (After a similar meeting yesterday Bidault described Molotov as "the smiling log"). This confirmed Smith's impression that in his resolution Molotov yielded nothing but nevertheless, taken out of their context, the proposals could look reasonable.

2. Bedell Smith then read to us from the instructions he had received from Dulles. Dulles said that Molotov's statement of principles solved no important issue and contained little more than what the Big Four had agreed upon in Berlin on Korea. There were two good issues on which to stand; the position of the United Nations and the demand for truly free elections. Dulles attached little importance to the differences of emphasis on these points as between delegations on our side. Smith said that he felt "very strongly" that in the light of the developments on Saturday last we should not now propose a restricted session. If we did we would give the unfortunate impression that we attached more importance to the Molotov proposals than they deserved. They should be refuted and exposed in plenary session.

3. Lord Reading agreed that a restricted session was now ill-advised and suggested that since Chou En-Lai at the last plenary had reserved the right to answer Smith's criticism of Polish and Czech representatives on the NNSC we might well leave the next move for a plenary to the other side. Later he added that after the plenary we should have to consider whether it was still advisable to have a restricted session.

4. Ronning expressed agreement with both Smith and Reading on the desirability of a plenary session and suggested that while the next move for a plenary might be left to the Communists we should not stand idly by if they delayed action for long since this could give the public the unfortunate impression that we were not paying sufficient attention to the proposals of the other side.

5. Pyun emphasized that any waiting attitude on our part would be bound to weaken our case. Therefore he would like to see us call a plenary session. The Philippine representative supported this view and suggested that if the Communists had not acted within the next two or three days we should call a plenary and put to them the question of whether they were prepared to accept the authority of the United Nations.

6. Smith nicely saved us from another unprofitable discussion of this issue by referring to his instructions from Dulles who had said that as there were so many minor points of difference between the Sixteen we should avoid getting into the discussion Molotov wanted in which our differences would be exposed. Instead we should get on with our two issues with the Commonwealth emphasizing free elections if they wished, and others emphasizing the United Nations issue.

7. As a result of further discussion it was agreed that if by Thursday morning the Communists had not requested a plenary session our side would. If they did not want the conference to meet on Friday we would agree to meet on Saturday. If the Communists requested a restricted session we would make our acceptance of their request conditional on their agreeing to a plenary session first. After such a restricted session we should press for another plenary in order to have the opportunity to make clear for the public our areas of disagreement. The Group of Sixteen should meet again after the next plenary to consider future action.

8. After the meeting Bedell Smith expressed great satisfaction to Holmes with his instructions from Dulles who he said had not only accepted "your idea" by which he meant the general Commonwealth views on emphasis but quite approved it. Our position on this subject is now much happier not because the Americans or a number of other delegations have accepted — or really understood — our attitude on the United Nations authority issue but because they have assumed that we will be content if we can emphasize our own specialty. This is not entirely satisfactory and may cause some trouble later if we are to be committed to questionable definitions but is undoubtedly the best we can do. It would be advisable for us under the circumstances if you agree to include in our statement a rejection of the Communist attacks on United Nations action in Korea which need not be any the less emphatic because it is defined in our terms.

KOREA

We have prepared a rough draft for a statement which might be made if a Korean plenary is held on Friday or Saturday. We think this might be timely as there has been no Canadian statement since you departed and there is something to be said for making our comments on Molotov's resolution before some of the arguments have become hackneyed and before we have been hamstrung by more extreme positions that might be taken by other delegations. While in our draft we are guided by the principles established in your parliamentary statement, we seek to avoid any clearly defined differences with other members of the Sixteen. There are inevitably differences in implication but we do not wish to encourage the Communists to probe them.

2. The statement begins with a strong rejection of Communist allegations against the United Nations. Then we reject as a sordid distortion of the truth the Communist argument that the "United States" is seeking to impose at this conference what it was unable to achieve by force of arms, and go on as follows: "The United Nations did not seek by force of arms to impose its will upon any country. It set out to defend the Republic of Korea from aggression and this it was happily successful in doing. Having repelled aggression the United Nations has resumed the effort which it had accepted many years before 1950, to seek the unification of the two parts into which the country had been divided. It is not a question of the United Nations seeking to impose a settlement on either part of Korea but in accordance with its practice in all disputes which have come before it, to seek by methods of conciliation to bring about a just and practical solution which will be accepted by the parties concerned. It is in order to seek such a solution that the Canadian delegation came to Geneva and we are determined patiently to work towards such a settlement at this conference — or at any subsequent meetings for this purpose. But we will not be diverted from this effort by allegations that the United Nations has acted illegally and that we have been the participants in aggression".

3. Our argument on the Molotov resolution is that we should like very much to be able to reach an agreement in principle of this kind and have carefully studied the resolution in the hope that we could do so. We have been driven inescapably however, to the conclusion that it would be dishonest and would mislead the world if we were to announce agreement in principle leaving the details until later when the so-called "details" are a fundamental part of the principles. We support this argument with reference to each point of the resolution as follows:

(a) Secret ballot, universal suffrage and proportional representation are essential to free elections but not sufficient to guarantee freedom of choice. These principles are observed in the Soviet Union but we would not call theirs free elections. Unless we are agreed on an effective programme of supervision we cannot say that we have agreed on the principle of free elections.

(b) We do not necessarily reject the conception of an all-Korean commission to prepare for the elections but it is meaningless to agree to the principle unless we are agreed on the commission's composition and functions. The proposals for composition and function put forward by the Communists suggest this is intended not as an agency to secure free elections but to establish Communist influence grossly disproportionate to the amount of its support in the country.

(c) We cannot pretend to have reached agreement in principle on the withdrawal of forces when there is a basic difference among us on the treatment of United Nations forces seeking to enable Korean self-determination and forces which have entered the country to impose a form of government not wanted by the Korean majority.

(d) We quote from your Ottawa statement on a supervisory commission to prove our flexible attitude towards this commission provided it is genuinely neutral, but point out that Molotov's support of the NNRC proves that there is no agreement at all on the meaning of neutrality. Furthermore here again there can be no agreement in principle unless we agree on the function of the commission.

(e) We say that we have listened with an open mind to repeated Communist suggestions for a guarantee or acceptance of responsibility by interested states but find that these have always been couched in such obscure language that we could not possibly say we had agreed in principle. It is meaningless to agree in principle on this question when Molotov himself said in his explanation that the nature of the obligations and the states to take part would be discussed later. Furthermore, if we are talking of accepting economic responsibilities UNKRA has done so and it is not our fault that it does not operate in the entire country.

4. We do not think it appropriate at this stage to say anything about the suspension of the conference or the affirmation of the armistice because these questions have not yet been thoroughly discussed among the Sixteen and no one as yet has publicly admitted that we are ready to break off the conference without a settlement. We are nevertheless bearing in mind your instructions on this point in private conversations and in the wording of our statements.

5. We should be glad to have your instructions on this draft as soon as possible. We should like to feel free to make additions or alterations within the framework of previous instructions but will notify you of anything substantial.

I believe the United States have moved as far as could be hoped in the direction of modifying their position on the United Nations authority issue, and though I agree that the danger still exists that the United Nations side may, in some of the speeches that will doubtless be made, appear to be committed to positions we would not wish to accept, I think we must now be content to let the United Nations issue and the free elections issue run together in harness, and that both issues can be usefully developed in replies to the most recent Communist gambit. In the circumstances I agree that the best course for our side to follow is to examine the Molotov resolution critically in plenary session, pressing the Communists for answers on details which are vital in any agreed procedures for free elections and the international supervision thereof, "rapprochement" between the two Koreas and the establishment of an all-Korean government. This approach should produce not one but several issues on which our side can take a firm stand and which, if rejected by the other side, should provide ample justification terminating the talks. We agree, subject of course to further advice from you on the basis of new developments, with the time table outlined in para. 7 of your telegram No. 145.

2. Prior to receipt of your telegram No. 150 we had drafted a telegram to you outlining points which you might suitably make in a statement in the plenary debate. I believe that in view of the pressure we have exerted on the United States to agree to develop some other issue besides that of United Nations authority on which to break off the conference, it would be desirable for you to make a statement developing the "free elections" issue in all its aspects. I concur in the opening passages of your statement as contained in paragraph 2 of your telegram No. 150, but feel that the last two sentences might be somewhat amplified. You might say that the presence of Canadian troops in Korea and the presence of a Canadian delegation at Geneva attests Canada's unqualified support for the United Nations as the pre-eminent international agency for making and keeping peace; that we have supported every step taken by the United Nations in its efforts to bring about the unification of Korea, and that we firmly believe that any agreement that is worked out to achieve this objective must be in accordance with the principles of the United Nations. You might go on to say that if the Geneva Conference is not able at this stage to reach an agreement on procedures for the establishment of a united and independent and democratic Korea, the Canadian Government is confident that the United Nations will continue to seek the attainment of this objective by peaceful means and Canada will continue to support these efforts.

3. This should give the United States some comfort in that it supports in a general way the concept of the responsibility of the United Nations in the Korean affair, it should help to impress on the Communists that there is no inclination in our camp to concur in the elimination of the United Nations from a Korean settlement, and it should serve to notify the South Koreans that the breakdown of the Geneva Conference does not mean the end of United Nations efforts to seek a solution of the Korean problem through negotiation.

4. Similarly, your introductory on the Molotov resolution might also be amplified. You might point out that a number of the fundamental principles contained in the Molotov resolution were agreed upon even before the Geneva Conference (e.g., the establishment of a united and independent Korea, the ultimate withdrawal of foreign forces) and hence represent no advance. Furthermore, principles have a different meaning for each side in respect of the way they envisage them being carried out, and consequently agreement on principles can be relatively meaningless unless there is also agreement on the methods by which these principles are to be implemented. Moreover, experience has shown that some terms (e.g., free elections, a democratic state, supervision) mean one thing in non-Communist countries and something quite different in Communist countries, and it is therefore vital that both sides mean the same thing if a true agreement is to be arrived at.

5. With respect to the individual points of the Molotov resolution, we thought it might be a good tactic to ask a number of questions both real and rhetorical which, if answered would serve to show the Communist hand more clearly and, if unanswered, would demonstrate that the other side is seeking only a fraudulent agreement. The following comments refer to each point of the Molotov resolution and your own corresponding outline.

Item 1. We would prefer to see you include queries along the following lines rather than your reference to "elections in the Soviet Union": Do the Communists agree that any Korean citizen can be a candidate, or do they intend that only candidates "approved" by the all-Korean "body" may seek election? As freedom for candidates to campaign is a vital part of free elections, are the Communists prepared to agree to the terms of the fifth item of the South Korean proposals, calling for full freedom of movement, speech, etc., for candidates, campaigners and their families? Under the Communist proposals, would the all-Korean legislature be completely sovereign within Korea, and would the executive branch of the government derive its authority from majority support in the legislature? Or would the executive be separate from the legislature? If so, how would the executive be chosen? By the all-Korean "body", in which the Communists would retain veto power? Since the Communists state that the question of Korea's future constitution is not a matter for consideration by the conference, do the Communists envisage that the freely-elected legislature would be a constituent assembly, empowered to draft a constitution by majority vote? Or do the Communists intend that the Korean constitution should be drawn up by the all-Korean "body"?

Item 2. In amplifying your suggested approach in paragraph (b), you might wish to include the following: If the body is to act only by unanimous decision, the veto power involved will be of crucial importance in connection with the tasks to be carried out. What exactly do the Communists mean when they say that the body would "facilitate a rapprochement" between the two Koreas? Would this mean that it would act as an interim government or that it would set up an interim government of some kind? Or would it be responsible for drafting an all-Korean constitution? How far will the responsibilities of the body go in the preparation of conduct of the elections? Would the body be expected to rule on the acceptability of candidates? and of parties? Would the body be solely responsible for the selection of scrutineers? Would it be responsible for establishing a police force to maintain law and order during the elections? Or would the international supervisory commission assist it in this task? What other functions would the body have? If the body is to have any significant executive powers, and is to be more than a negotiating agency for arranging elections, the veto power involved could completely prejudice the freedom of the elections or the establishment of a truly representative government after elections.

Item 3. We concur in your proposed comment here. We had considered saying that discussion of the phased withdrawal of foreign forces would be better left over until further progress is made on procedures for the holding of elections and the setting up of an all-Korean government.

Item 4. In amplification of your statement you might wish to include the following questions: What do the Communists mean by "supervision"? Would the commission which they envisage merely observe the elections or would it have the power and the means to correct conditions which interfere with the proper conduct of elections? Would it be competent to appoint scrutineers? Would it assist the all-Korean body in maintaining law and order prior to and during the elections? In short, would it be a powerless excrescence or would it have an active and useful role to play in ensuring fair play and a free choice of representatives by the electorate?

Item 5. We concur in your suggested approach, and in the additional paragraph you have suggested in your telegram No. 153 of June 10.†

The above is for your guidance and we hope assistance, to be used by you in the light of your appreciation of the circumstances at the time.

GENEVA CONFERENCE — GENERAL

As a result of the last two plenaries on Indo-China, there is an attitude of almost unrelieved gloom on our side about the prospects of the Conference achieving anything on either Korea or Indo-China. There was some hope after Molotov's performance on Tuesday which, like Bidault's seemed clearly intended for the Paris rather than the Geneva audience, that this was nothing more than a blatant effort to influence the French Assembly and one which by reason of its humiliating attack on France might boomerang. This hope that after an excursion into politics the Communists might, if there were no disastrous developments in Paris, go back to negotiations in private has been considerably dimmed by Chou En-Lai's utterly uncompromising speech yesterday in which he seemed to go out of his way to emphasise what he knew to be points on which the Conference might well break. As the United Kingdom delegation have pointed out, there was nothing new in any of the speeches. Old positions were being repeated but they were becoming more rigid by repetition.

2. Eden, after agreement on tactics with Bedell Smith, asked Molotov in the interval what he wanted to do today and suggested that they could get down to business on the problem of Laos and Cambodia in restricted session. Molotov merely said that they should go on in plenaries which were more useful and there were others who asked to speak. There is clearly no possibility of moving forward in plenary session. Present tentative thinking in the United Kingdom delegation is that after conclusion of the French debate they should have one more try at a restricted session. If the Communists do not respond this will be a pretty clear indication that they do not want a settlement and it might be best to break off the Conference. They are concerned, however, that the military talks should go on and are wondering if a kind of skeleton conference might carry on here.

3. Bedell Smith and Eden seem to be working in as close harmony as ever but the Americans might be somewhat more impatient to break off. As a result of the Indo-China developments Smith is now anxious to get the Korean talks over with. Although it was he who proposed at the last meeting of the 16 to sit back and wait for a Communist move, yesterday he took the initiative in pressing for a Korean plenary on Friday afternoon to which Molotov agreed. He is now thinking of a meeting of 16 on Saturday and does not want to go on with restricted sessions at all. If the 16 insist on restricted sessions he would agree but he doesn't see much point in them now.

4. Decision on tactics for the Korean Conference are now more dependent than previously on the Indo-China Conference. If the latter breaks up there will probably not be any very strong disposition to continue the former, given the fact that the latter was the only conference for which there was any real hope of success. If the Indo-China sessions end with a bang not much notice will be given to the terms on which the Korean Conference was broken off or suspended. Nevertheless we should presumably continue trying to put our case in the best possible light in the time which may remain. It is, of course, also possible that if the question of whether or not the Indo-China Conference is to continue enters a fragile stage in the near future we may be asked to carry on quietly the Korean talks in order not to break any windows.

5. The United Kingdom and possibly New Zealand will be speaking in the plenary on Friday and we have put our name down tentatively pending receipt of your instructions.

If at the next meeting of the Sixteen, there is any disposition on the part of other delegations to ask for a restricted session, you might give some support to this for the following reason.

2. The conference has produced some minor concessions from the other side, and in view of Wang Pin-nan's conversation with you it might be possible to get them to concede one or two more points of detail. While this probably would not lead to productive negotiations at Geneva, it could leave us in a more advantageous position when some further effort to negotiate a Korean settlement is made. We could reasonably expect that the Communists could, in a future conference, be held to the points to which they agree at Geneva.

3. If the Americans are reluctant to hold a restricted session on the ground that it would give the appearance that we set more store by Molotov's resolution than it deserves, you might consider suggesting that a restricted session limit its agenda to the first of Molotov's "principles" — free elections.

KOREA

Chou En-Lai opened Friday's plenary session with a statement announcing full support for the Molotov proposals and said that they should be adopted by the conference "as the basis for further discussion". The United States delegate, by opposing the reaching of agreement through consultations between the two Koreas, was seeking to maintain the antagonism between them and to make impossible the peaceful settlement of the Korean problem. As for United Nations supervision of elections it was inconceivable that one of the belligerent sides should have this role. It should be taken by the Supervisory Commission which he had proposed. He then went on to defend the work in Korea of the NNSC and in particular of its Polish and Czech members. He accused the United States of repeatedly violating the Armistice Agreement and making difficult the work of the NNSC. The United States was seeking to abolish this commission in order to have more freedom to arm South Korea and threaten the peace in Korea and the security of China. Although the United States had agreed to the composition of the NNSC in Korea, it objected to the supervision of an armistice in Indo-China by a commission of similar composition, thus the United States was trying to prevent an armistice in Indo-

China. The conference had already reached agreement or had come close to agreement on not a few points and there was "no reason whatsoever why we should stop going on". On June 5 the United States delegate had said that he was prepared to rest the points of difference in the discussion before the bar of world opinion. If he meant to respond to the clamouring of Syngman Rhee about walking out of the conference and thought there was no need for the conference to keep going, Chou En-Lai could not agree nor would world opinion.

2. Ronning spoke next. (Our telegram No. 158 of June 11).¹⁹

3. McIntosh of New Zealand said it was clear that the spirit of give and take essential for negotiation was wholly lacking. The Molotov proposals, he said, contained much with which it was impossible to disagree, but what good was it to declare principles at the conference when there was fundamental disagreement not only about the method of translating such principles into reality but even about the meaning of the principles themselves. We were in fundamental disagreement about the preparation and conduct of elections. The form of supervision proposed by the Communists was inadequate since it would provide for an unsatisfactory outside body giving advice to an unsatisfactory All-Korean Commission. The United Nations was capable of providing a genuinely impartial supervisory body because it was so broadly based. By abandoning their perverse attitude towards the United Nations the Chinese could open a way for settlement of the Korean problem. The United Nations was unlikely to withhold its endorsement of any supervisory arrangement acceptable to the conference.

4. Nam Il covered no new ground. He endorsed the Molotov resolution and reviewed his own proposals in the light of that resolution. He concluded by attacking Smith's statement of June 5 about the NNSC.

5. Eden opened his statement by expressing his "complete agreement" with everything said earlier by the Canadian and New Zealand representatives. The conference had thrown into relief two fundamental issues, the first being the authority of the United Nations. It was by carrying out the principles of the United Nations Charter that this conference could find a peaceful settlement in Korea. By taking up arms to resist aggression the United Nations had strengthened its authority as a supreme international organization. The second issue was the question of free elections. It was essential that these should be supervised by a truly impartial commission composed so that it could take effective decisions and commanding the authority to carry them out. The All-Korean Commission proposed by the Communists could not work effectively because it would give a veto to the North Korean minority. Moreover, the Chinese proposed Supervisory Commission would leave unaltered the functions and responsibilities of the All-Korean Commission. If no way could be found to resolve the differences on the two basic issues, then we would have to admit that the conference had not been able to complete its task. The United Nations members should report back to that organization concerning this position and this would ensure that while the armistice remained in force the search for a Korean political settlement could be resumed whenever the right moment came.

6. Prince Wan devoted most of his statement to a defence of the moral authority of the United Nations. He reiterated his endorsement of the ROK proposals as a basis for discussion and declared himself in favour of Korean elections being supervised by the United Nations.

7. Spaak spoke forcibly from the briefest of notes. He said that for our side to accept the international supervisory body proposed by the Communists — a body outside the United Nations — would be to admit that the United Nations had been an aggressor in Korea. This would kill the United Nations and the principle of collective security. He then suggested that we could move forward if the Molotov proposals concerning elections could be amended along the following lines: "In order to prepare and organize free general elections throughout Korea the United Nations shall appoint a commission. The members of this commission shall be selected impartially in order to enjoy the trust of both sides. This commission shall act in close co-operation with the Republic of Korea and the Democratic People's Republic of Korea. The questions pertaining to the final composition and terms of reference of this body shall be the subject of further consideration."

If they could not be so amended then we would have to face the conclusion drawn by Eden.

8. Bidault defended the United Nations and rejected the Molotov resolution. He then listed five principles for a Korean settlement. These principles were those which Eden had made at a previous plenary (our telegram No. 22 of May 14) with this small difference that one of them called for United Nations sanction to any Korean settlement. If the Communists rejected these principles the failure of the conference would be their responsibility.

The Americans are preparing a program for submission to the 16 on Monday. In its present tentative state it recommends that we hold no more meetings, either plenary or restricted, as these would merely give the Communists a chance to develop their point about an international guarantee. The representatives of the three Allied inviting powers should write in similar terms to Molotov saying that they and their associates consider that as the Communists have rejected our two essential principles of United Nations authority and free elections, continued sessions would serve no useful purpose. They are thinking in terms of issuing a joint declaration by the 16, at the same time explaining why we are breaking off the conference. Furthermore, the 16 would prepare a report to the United Nations the general principles of which would be worked out in Geneva with the final drafting left to a working group in Washington.

2. When we discussed this plan at the Commonwealth meeting this morning there was general agreement that it would be very difficult to ask that there be no meetings after yesterday's session because of Spaak's quite specific proposal, Bidault's less specific re-introduction of Eden's principles and the question we had outlined. We may be caught up, however, in what seems to be an American urge to cut short the whole Geneva Conference. (American correspondents and members of the United States delegation make little secret of their hope that there will be no further Communist concessions on Indo-China for the simple reason that if the Communists consider it to their advantage to prolong the conference, the only proper course for our side is to stop it — in order to do it is not quite clear what).

3. Chou's speech yesterday made it clear that the Communists are prepared to talk about Korea indefinitely and that the initiative to break up the conference will have to come from our side. The 16 for the most part had hoped yesterday to move towards more solid ground for a break on the two selected issues but Bidault, intentionally or unintentionally, may have opened up new grounds for debate and Spaak, who arrived in Geneva the night before, made his effective intervention and proposal without consulting the 16.

4. We understand that in its original form the United States draft declaration spoke of the possibility of reconvening the conference but that this was removed by Robertson. He may have acted because of strong ROK objections to any suggestion of suspending the conference.

5. One of those who worried at American pressure for a quick break up is Urrutia of Colombia. As one of the few people here who knows anything about the United Nations he is quite properly concerned about our case in the Assembly. He would like to slow down the American program by requesting three or four days to consider this after it is presented on Monday. I think we should insist on adequate time to seek instructions while showing no inclination to drag the conference on unduly.

6. It will probably be impossible to avoid some kind of joint declaration of the 16 but we fear that this will force us to face the issue of United Nations authority. Spaak took a strong position on the importance of the Supervisory Commission issuing from the United Nations although Eden, Bidault and McIntosh used language on this subject more in accordance with our thinking. While we might get around the question of authority in general terms, it will not be easy to find a formula on the Supervisory Commission which is in accordance with principles stated by you, Eden and Bidault and acceptable to those who are on record as believing that to compromise with the United Nations right to appoint the Supervisory Commission is to destroy the United Nations.

7. We doubt if there will be much inclination among the 16 to press for a restricted session, but if there is any support for such a move we shall use the arguments contained in your telegram No. 109 of June 11. As the possibility of getting the ROK and the Americans to agree to restricted sessions is slight, there might be more (although not much) chance of getting the Chinese to concede points in plenary. We continue to be worried about restricted sessions for negotiation for agreement mentioned in paragraph 7 of our telegram No. 142 of June 7, a view which is pretty widely held among our friends here.

The sixteen met this morning and after considerable discussion agreed that at the plenary session which Molotov has requested for Tuesday afternoon they would listen to Communist statements then ask for adjournment during which the sixteen could meet. If as expected the Communists presented nothing new, Spaak and Garcia representing a European and an Asian country would make statements in plenary saying on behalf of the sixteen that we saw nothing new in what had been said and as far as we were concerned the conference was at an end and we would report to the United Nations.

2. The next day Eden and Prince Wan as our Chairman would meet with Molotov as Chairman for the other side and present him with our declaration which at the same time would be made public.

3. Consideration was also given to the American draft declaration as contained in our No. 162 of June 13.²⁰ Certain drafting changes were suggested by Spaak and others and it was agreed that a Drafting Committee consisting of the United States, United Kingdom, ROK, Thailand and Canada should meet this afternoon to attempt to provide an agreed text. If an agreed text is not available by this evening for consideration by another meeting of the sixteen tomorrow morning, a request will be made to Molotov to postpone plenary until Wednesday.

4. The Americans are clearly determined to end the Korea conference at the earliest possible moment with no more than one further session at the most. There was very wide agreement among the sixteen for this policy and unless the Communists introduce some quite unexpected move it would be virtually impossible to alter this programme. Bedell Smith emphasized the importance of breaking off the conference now when we had a measure of agreement among the sixteen and urged the desirability also of accepting the American draft without extensive alteration, not because it was a perfectly satisfactory document, but because it represented a compromise among the views of the sixteen. He feared that if any delegation pressed its arguments for alteration we would be involved in endless efforts to reach agreement and made a strong plea for delegations to accept the phrasing which he recognized did not entirely satisfy them in order not to induce discord at this important moment.

5. Pyun who made a few suggested changes gave a pretty clear demonstration of what Smith had in mind by threatening that the ROK might disassociate themselves from the declaration and generally acting like a fighting cock to the intense annoyance of Bedell Smith.

6. It is clear that the United States and other delegations believe they have reached genuine compromise with our views and in their definition of the first principle we believe they have. The reference in the second principle to "supervision of an appropriate United Nations body" is not in strict accordance with our views and both Ronning and McIntosh this morning registered this point at the meeting without provoking a dangerous debate on the subject. In the Drafting Committee we shall make every effort to secure a change in this phrase but we have grave doubts if we shall succeed and we would not want to be responsible for breaking up the fragile unity of the sixteen on this issue. Our three Commonwealth colleagues who are still holding the same position are not prepared to press the point and we hope that you will agree to our not doing so either. What has worried us is that we should be saddled with this position in the United Nations Assembly by reason of our having signed the declaration. However, there has been frank recognition within the sixteen that there is a difference of opinion on this issue and that we are accepting the declaration as a formula for covering our difference and preventing an open breach. Under these circumstances we could probably move from this position in the Assembly if we wished to do so without being accused of bad faith.

We agree with the proposal to break and while it looks a little hurried we would not hold back the U.S. timetable; unless, which is unlikely, Molotov had something really concrete to contribute tomorrow.

2. You have well understood and expressed the reservations which we would have on text of declaration given in your 162. We realize the importance of retaining the minimum of apparent unity among the sixteen. We would urge however that as a first preference the second principle should refer to "appropriate international body acceptable to the United Nations"; as a second best we would ask that the phrase "within the framework" introducing the two principles be changed to read "in accordance with". We also think that the use of the phrase "rule of the United Nations" is inaccurate and confusing.

3. If you are unable to obtain either of the above amendments, you may agree to the communiqué going forward; you should make it clear to the Sixteen however that this agreement is with every reservation as to our accepting to be held "within the framework" of the two principles as they are reported in your 162, when the question of Korea is taken up again in the United Nations; and that at the U.N. we would have to interpret "U.N. authority" as a demand by the Communists that we disavow United Nations authority; and "appropriate U.N. body" as an "international body acceptable to the United Nations". This would be our approach at the U.N. and the one I would take before the Canadian Parliament and people.

My immediately following telegram contains the text of a statement read by Ronning at this morning's meeting of the Sixteen in accordance with instructions in your telegram No. 113 of June 14. In the Drafting Committee we made every effort to secure amendments to meet our wishes but with little success. It seemed appropriate, therefore, to make this honest statement in order to avoid controversy. The Colombian and New Zealand representatives associated themselves with our position. This frank exposition seemed to be well received and we were thanked by several representatives for our accommodating attitude. Bedell Smith expressed appreciation and said that in the same spirit he would explain the American position which was quite different from ours. After the meeting he telephoned to say that he could not thank us enough for the attitude we had taken which had helped him enormously in his very difficult problems with the ROK. He said he had told Pyun that if he caused any trouble over this question he personally would "side with the Canadians".

2. After agreeing on the text the Sixteen considered tactics in the event that the Communists as expected may this afternoon ask for a reaffirmation of the armistice. It was agreed that in this case Bedell Smith would immediately say that we stood by the armistice and that its continuance was not an issue at this conference. Pyun threatened to follow with an explanation of the ROK position on the armistice but every effort is being made to keep him quiet as he could upset the entire apple cart. We had an ominous indication of his attitude in the Drafting Committee when he opposed the inclusion of the words "by peaceful means" in the final sentence of our original draft which defined the United Nations objectives in Korea. While he did not say that his Government intended to resort to other than peaceful means, he said that this phrase would imply that we intended to go on having more talks with the Communists and more conferences on this subject. In the Korean view we had now exhausted these peaceful means. We finally got round the problem by altering the conclusion of the declaration.

3. Bedell Smith was extremely sharp with Pyun this morning and is clearly in no mood to stand for any nonsense.

I should like, under instructions, to make a brief statement of the Canadian position on the draft declaration. In order to avoid any appearance of disunity at this important time and in order not to delay the programme for ending this Conference on which we have all agreed, we are prepared to accept the declaration and sign it. We appreciate the spirit of compromise with which other delegations have sought to meet our views but we feel bound to make clear, however, that the declaration as it now stands in several respects does not represent the views we have put forward at this Conference and continue to hold. We have no intention of making any public declaration of dissent. We consider, however, that we should frankly explain that when this subject is considered again in the United Nations or in any other Conference in which we might take part we would feel free to put forward again the views which we have expressed here and which have been stated as Canadian policy by the Secretary of State for External Affairs before Parliament. In the circumstances we would wish to interpret the reference in the third paragraph to "the authority of the United Nations" in the context in which we have used it at this conference which was for the purpose of rejecting the Communist denial of the legitimacy of the United Nations mission in Korea. We would also wish to interpret the reference to "United Nations supervision" in the second principle as embracing our formula of "an International Body acceptable to the United Nations".

2. I should like to make clear that I am not raising this question for further discussion. We accept an honest difference of opinion on the subject but would like to make this explanation to our friends in order to avoid any possible charges of bad faith. Ends.

KOREA

Following is draft declaration by the sixteen "as agreed upon at this morning's meeting", Text Begins:

Pursuant to the resolution of August 28, 1953 of the United Nations General Assembly and the Berlin communiqué of February 18, 1954 we as nations who contributed military forces to the United Nations Command in Korea have been participating in the Geneva Conference for the purpose of establishing a united and independent Korea by peaceful means.

We have made a number of proposals and suggestions in accord with the past efforts of the United Nations to bring about the unification, independence and freedom of Korea and within the framework of the following two principles which we believe to be fundamental:

1. The United Nations under its Charter is fully and rightfully empowered to take collective action, to repel aggression, to restore peace and security and to extend its good offices to seeking a peaceful settlement in Korea.

2. In order to establish a unified independent and democratic Korea, genuinely free elections should be held under United Nations supervision for representatives in the National Assembly in which representation shall be in direct proportion to the indigenous population in Korea.

We have earnestly and patiently searched for a basis of agreement which would enable us to proceed with Korean unification in accordance with these fundamental principles.

The Communist delegations have rejected our every effort to obtain agreement. The principle issues between us therefore are clear. Firstly we accept and assert the authority of the United Nations. The Communists repudiate and reject the authority and competence of the United Nations in Korea and have labelled the United Nations itself as the tool of aggression. Were we to accept this position of the Communists, it would mean the death of the principle of collective security and of the United Nations itself. Secondly we desire genuinely free elections. The Communists insist upon procedures which would make genuinely free elections impossible. It is clear that the Communists will not accept impartial and effective supervision of free elections. Mainly, they have shown their intention to maintain Communist control over North Korea. They have persisted in the same attitudes which have frustrated United Nations efforts to unify Korea since 1947.

We believe, therefore, that it is better to face the fact of our disagreement than to raise false hopes and mislead the peoples of the world into believing that there is agreement where there is none.

In the circumstances we have been compelled reluctantly and regretfully to conclude that so long as the Communist delegations reject the two fundamental principles which we consider indispensable further consideration and examination of the Korean question by the conference would serve no useful purpose. We reaffirm our continued support for the objectives of the United Nations in Korea. In accordance with the resolution of the General Assembly of the United Nations of August 28, 1953, the member states parties to this declaration will inform the United Nations concerning the proceedings at this conference. KOREA

Yesterday the Korean phase of the Geneva Conference was terminated according to plan. Other plans for the session went astray. The Communists undoubtedly know our intentions in this respect and came well prepared.

2. Nam Il began by saying that the rejection by the United Nations side of the Communist proposals made it clear that the conference was now unable to reach agreement on the peaceful unification of Korea, although he thought that we should still try to reach a satisfactory solution. Therefore, the conference should consider the problems pertaining to the strengthening of peace in Korea. He then proposed that the conference participants should agree to continue their efforts for agreement in the interests of ensuring peaceful conditions in Korea. They should:

(a) Recommend to the governments concerned the proportionate withdrawal of foreign troops from Korea as soon as possible.

(b) Reduce within a year the North Korean and South Korean troop strengths to 100,000 men each.

(c) Form from representatives of both Koreas a commission to recommend to both governments proposals for the gradual liquidation of the state of war and of the transition of troops on both sides to "a peaceful position".

(d) Recognize that treaties between either Korea and other states which involved military obligations were incompatible with a peaceful unification of Korea.

(e) Form an all-Korean committee to work out and implement agreed measures for establishing economic and cultural relations between the two Koreas.

(f) Recognize that the Geneva participants should ensure the peaceful development of Korea.

3. Chou En-Lai said the conference should continue its discussion of the Molotov principles. However, it was clear that the United States delegate and the other delegates following his lead were unwilling to reach any agreement on the peaceful unification of Korea. In the circumstances, we should then strive for agreement on the question of consolidating peace in Korea. Therefore, he supported the Nam Il proposals. The Armistice Agreement would not make for the stable peace necessary for the eventual peaceful unification of Korea. Paragraph 60 of the Armistice Agreement obliges the countries concerned to withdraw their troops after the armistice. He then went on to argue the reasonableness of the programme presented by Nam Il and proposed that it be studied in restricted session by the delegates of China, the Big Four and the two Koreas.

4. Molotov referred to Eden's statement of May 13 that it was necessary for the conference to agree on basic principles and said that it was because he shared Eden's point of view that he had made his five proposals. However, these had been met with a "rude refusal" by the United Nations side to consider them concretely. On June 11 the Canadian representative had asked "so many irrelevant and completely inappropriate questions concerning the Soviet proposals . . . that this may be only considered as an attempt to confuse the issue". Did that representative by attacking his proposals mean also to attack Eden's basic principles. Concerning our two issues he reiterated that his government stood for the authority of the United Nations not to be undermined by violations of its Charter and the principle of free elections was fully provided for in his proposals. It was clear that the stand taken by the United Nations side made agreement impossible on even the first steps towards Korean unity. In the present conditions, the eventual unification of Korea could best be facilitated by the proposals now put forward by Nam Il which were in the interests of the Korean people and of strengthening international peace. He then attacked the United States-ROK Defence Treaty as meaning the permanent foreign occupation of the Korean territory. United States "aggressive circles" were seeking to make South Korea a spring-board "for unleashing a new war in the Far East". In conclusion, he suggested that the conference should subscribe to a declaration, the text of which is carried by my immediately following telegram.

5. At this point the conference recessed and the Sixteen met according to plan. Bedell Smith termed the presentation by the other side "extremely well done". In the circumstances, he now thought that our joint declaration should be read in plenary. Spaak agreed and pointed out that it would be almost impossible to oppose Molotov's declaration. Smith said that he was prepared to refer to the Armistice Agreement as providing for the cessation of hostilities in perpetuity. The Molotov declaration was only a statement of good intent. Eden said that he didn't see how we could avoid accepting the declaration. Smith stated that his delegation could not subscribe to the second part of the declaration "because we haven't that confidence". He noticeably made no distinction between the Koreans on this occasion. It was finally agreed that Smith should make his statement on the Armistice Agreement. Casey criticized the Nam Il proposals. Garcia reiterated that we would not compromise on our two issues and Prince Wan read our declaration into the record.

6. At the resumed session Smith said that the Armistice Agreement would remain in effect as long as the Communists observed it. Moreover, it provided for everything in the Molotov declaration and in much more exact terms. Casey said the Nam Il proposals put the ROK on a par with the aggressor regime in the North and sought to deny ROK access to its friends. In turning to the Molotov declaration he said that while he would agree with its tone, he could not take the responsibility of expressing confidence that North Korea might not threaten the peace.

7. Garcia flooded the ground he sought to cover with rhetoric, but otherwise fulfilled his assignment. Spaak speaking extemporaneously made similar points more economically. He said that he would have supported the Molotov declaration except that the Armistice Agreement already dealt with the matter. The time had come to separate, but nothing had been lost and in time it should be possible for the parties to meet again and continue their efforts to reach agreement.

8. Pyun continued his record of unfortunate interventions by saying that the Communist speeches had proved that they were trying to conquer all Korea through infiltration. The Molotov declaration was part of this sinister scheme. Then Prince Wan read the declaration of the Sixteen.²¹

9. Molotov said he doubted whether all the Sixteen had read the Nam Il proposals. It was clear that the United Nations side frustrated efforts to reach agreement here because they wanted to use the conference to foist the South Korean regime on North Korea. With Rhee crying for a new crusade to the North he had hoped that the conference would say a word for peace. There was nothing in our declaration which would help to secure peace in Korea.

10. Chou En-Lai pointed out that the Armistice Agreement was binding only on two belligerent sides. The conference should have its own agreement but the United States were against any agreement on the Korean question. He then made a proposal, the text of which is carried by my immediately following telegram.

11. After Lord Reading had said that a break-off here did not mean the abandonment of hope for the future and Spaak had said he did not oppose the spirit behind the proposals of Chou En-Lai and Molotov, Chou stated that our declaration was that of one side only. Why should the conference not express a common desire to try again to solve the Korean problem. If we didn't have this much spirit of negotiation, it would be a matter of deep regret to him. Spaak then said that to remove any doubt about his attitude he would be prepared to agree to Chou's proposal. When Eden asked if Spaak's position was generally acceptable Smith intervened to say that the Chou proposal made this conference responsible for a Korean settlement. It was not intended to be a permanent body set outside of the United Nations. It had been given a specific mission which it had been unable to achieve. He was, therefore, not prepared to associate himself with the declaration. Our own declaration had made it clear that the Communists could begin new negotiations any time by accepting our two principles. Eden, as Chairman, then said that since there was no voting procedure the conference could only take note of the various points raised. No one challenged Eden on this point.

12. Chou En-Lai said he was pleased that the conference would take note of the proposal made by him and seconded by Spaak. He now knew how the United States delegate had been preventing the conference from ever arriving at the least conciliatory agreement. Pyun then said it was not right for the conference to make a joint statement and that Spaak was not representing the ROK.

13. Spaak then sought to extricate himself from his unfortunate position by saying that he supported the Chou proposal because it stressed the hope that there would be more discussion on Korea. He thought such discussion should be in the United Nations. Chou replied that this could mean that China would be excluded from further negotiations. That would make eventual agreement on Korea impossible.

14. There were no more speakers.

KOREA

The concluding session of the Korean Conference was in many respects a pretty sorry affair. The Communists pressed hard and skilfully to break our common front and their delight when a crack appeared was illustrated by the bursts of gleeful laughter from all the North Koreans when Pyun said in Korean that Spaak did not speak for the 16. The situation would have been much worse if Eden had not been in the Chair and able to produce a formula which, while not impeccable, succeeded in stopping the meeting before we were all in disarray. Spaak's indignation over American intransigence, the confusion which the Communist proposals had thrown into our ranks and the hesitation of delegates to differ with the Americans were all dramatically evident to those present. It must have done a good deal to confirm Communist beliefs about our position vis-à-vis the United States and the ROK.

2. The basic cause of the trouble, in our view, was the rigidity of American instructions. We assume that they were unable to consider any joint declaration with the Communists because of Dulles' rebuff to Bedell Smith's earlier proposal along this line (our telegram No. 127 of June 3). While some of their criticisms of both Soviet and Chinese proposals were justified, it is more difficult to justify their refusal to consider them at all or even to suggest amendments. Assisted by Spaak they found a clever formula to get round accepting the Soviet proposal, but it was at best a debating point. It is possible also that we lost a useful opportunity to secure a Communist declaration that would provide some moral deterrent to North Korean aggression. The Chinese proposal was perhaps more objectionable in that it did seem to confirm the permanence of the present machinery without reference to the United Nations as at least an alternative body to consider a settlement, but this might have been made a matter of interpretation. Furthermore, it is not inconsistent with the United Nations resolution of last August. As Spaak pointed out, we should not seem to be rejecting the principles of the first paragraph to the effect that we were prepared to continue our efforts to find a settlement.

3. There was a good deal of feeling at the beginning of the caucus which we shared that we ought not to reject the Soviet proposal out of hand, but the Americans were not to be moved and the formula of referring to the armistice was accepted as a compromise. We had of course no time to discuss the Chinese proposal. Spaak, who had been indignant over the treatment given to the Soviet proposal, exploded over the Chinese suggestion. As his neighbours he consulted us. We agreed sotto voce that it seemed to us unwise to reject the resolutions but warned him of our understanding of American instructions. When he took his stand for free speech we felt some obligation to support him. We were on the point of backing him up in terms which would interpret the Chinese proposal in the light of the declaration of the 16 when Eden launched his compromise suggestion and it was then clearly better to say nothing that might lead to further public declarations and a general debate.

4. There may be certain compensations. Perhaps in the long run this gesture of free thinking will be seen as good democratic practice. It certainly provided some relief for the feelings of those who have had to knuckle under to Mr. Pyun for so long. From the point of view of our own intentions and your instructions it is perhaps a gain that the Americans were put in a position to reaffirm our belief that the armistice continues and to do so in terms that Pyun did not publicly reject at the conference. Spaak, furthermore, in his initial statement and in his gesture made clear that the 16 were by no means united in rejecting further efforts at a settlement.

5. On the whole the Communists took the closing of the conference relatively mildly. One would not have expected them to miss any opportunity of placing the blame on the United States and the ROK but they might have made more strenuous efforts to prolong the conference. There was even a note of resignation in Molotov's initial statement. He was quite aware of what we had in mind partly because it was pretty well reported in the press and partly because Eden had talked to him of the possibility several days ago and found him not much surprised or upset by the suggestion. Although we were not able to end even on a note of agreement to disagree it was not a particularly bellicose finale.

REDUCTION OF FORCES IN KOREA

The possibility of reducing Canadian forces in Korea has been under consideration for some time. The only decision that has been taken is the Cabinet decision of January 11, 1954 that the total number of Canadian military personnel in South Korea should be gradually reduced, provided that this is done consistently with Canadian obligations to the United Nations.

2. On the basis of a Cabinet decision of September 24, 1953, however, the United Kingdom Government was informed that, on the assumption that it might be possible to reduce the Commonwealth Division to an integrated brigade group pending its complete withdrawal from Korea and, so far as the Canadian forces were concerned, from the Far East, the appropriate Canadian contribution would be one infantry battalion and that a reduced Canadian naval contribution might be one destroyer or frigate. It was to be understood that no firm commitment was implied.

3. The Minister of National Defence subsequently agreed that Canada might also contribute one field ambulance at a reduced strength tailored to the field medical needs of the proposed brigade group.

4. Military representatives in London of the Commonwealth nations concerned have recently examined the stages in which Commonwealth military forces in Korea could be reduced. Their report, dated June 10, differs only slightly, so far as Canadian forces are concerned, from a directive issued by the Canadian Chiefs of Staff with the concurrence of the Minister of National Defence.

5. The report recommends that the reduction take place in two phases. In the first phase the Commonwealth Division would be reduced by the withdrawal of one brigade group. In the second phase it would be further reduced down to one brigade group. The military representatives further recommend that the Commonwealth identity of the forces remaining in Korea should be preserved, and that any suggestion that other United Nations forces be incorporated in the Commonwealth Division should be resisted.

6. It is estimated that Canadian Army strength in the Far East would be reduced in the first phase by approximately 30%, in the second phase by approximately 77%. The contribution of the Royal Canadian Navy would be reduced concurrently by the withdrawal of two destroyers during the first phase, leaving one destroyer or frigate in Korean waters. There are no units of the Royal Canadian Air Force involved.

7. The report has already been approved by the United Kingdom and New Zealand Governments.

8. I recommend, with the concurrence of the Minister of National Defence, that the report be approved in principle as a basis for discussion with the United States authorities. I further recommend that approval be given for these discussions to commence as soon as the other Commonwealth Governments concerned are in agreement.²²

38. The Secretary of State for External Affairs referring to discussion at the meeting of July 28th, 1954, said that the United States had recently informed the 16 governments who had forces in Korea that further American troops would be withdrawn and that the U.S. hoped to reduce their contingent to a strength of 2 divisions in the near future. At the same time, the U.S. authorities had said they hoped the other nations would keep a force of divisional strength in Korea. In effect this would mean the maintenance of the Commonwealth Division at full strength. It would be recalled that an agreement had been reached with the United Kingdom and New Zealand whereby the Commonwealth Division would be reduced initially by 30 percent and in the second phase by 77 percent of the forces committed, and that the matter would be discussed with the United States as soon as full agreement had been reached with other Commonwealth nations concerned. The Australian Prime Minister had now indicated that he saw no reason for immediate discussion of the problem in Washington and that the matter might be considered at the conference which was to be held in the Philippines, on September 9th, on the possibility of establishing a Southeast Asia Defence Organization. As Canada would not be attending the conference in the Philippines and would, for the present, at least, not be associated with this possible S.E.A.D.O., this seemed clearly undesirable. We should press for immediate discussion of the problem in Washington and thereafter make what announcements would be necessary. It was important to proceed expeditiously with the withdrawal of United Nations forces from Korea as President Rhee had been receiving some informal advice that the U.S. people would support him in any active operations which he might initiate. Such support was highly unlikely and the further withdrawal of United Nations' forces would help to make it clear that Mr. Rhee could not expect the support he undoubtedly hoped for. United Nations forces, including the Commonwealth Division, should be reduced in size as soon as possible and an announcement made of what was being done.

39. The Cabinet noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding the reduction of Commonwealth forces in Korea and agreed that the Australian authorities be informed it would be desirable to discuss the matter in Washington as soon as possible and not at the conference being convened in the Philippines to consider a Southeast Asia Defence Organization.

KOREA; WITHDRAWAL OF CANADIAN TROOPS

41. The Minister of National Defence, referring to discussion at the meeting of August 18th, 1954, reported that agreement had now been reached with other U.N. nations having forces in Korea concerning the withdrawal of troops from that country. It was proposed to reduce the Canadian forces to the strength of one infantry battalion and a field ambulance by the end of the year. One of the battalions was due for relief in October, the others in April and May, respectively. It had been suggested that the first of these be relieved by the despatch of an additional battalion immediately and that all the infantry units now in Korea be returned to Canada at the time agreed upon. While this seemed a natural administrative course, the public would likely think it strange to begin the withdrawal of troops from Korea by sending out to that country a new battalion. He thought that the best course would be to bring home the two battalions which had served the longest in Korea and leave the third one there until May if this were necessary. If it were found that Canadian troops would still be needed after that time, the situation would be reconsidered in the light of the existing circumstances. He proposed to make a public announcement as soon as the plans for reducing the strength of the contingent had been settled.

42. In the course of discussion, it was pointed out that the troops belonged to the permanent force and, further, that it would be extremely difficult to create a composite battalion of those persons who might volunteer to remain in Korea beyond the normal tour of duty there.

43. The Cabinet noted with approval the report of the Minister of National Defence concerning the proposals for the withdrawal of Canadian troops from Korea.

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], October 14, 1954

KOREA — FUTURE OF THE NEUTRAL NATIONS
SUPERVISORY COMMISSION (NNSC)

I attach copies of the following communications between the Department and our Washington Embassy concerning the desire of the United States to render the NNSC inoperative:

Washington teletype WA-1693 of September 27;†

Our teletype EX-1828 of October 4;†

Washington despatch No. 1743 of October 6;†

Washington letter No. 1756 of October 8;†

Washington teletype WA-1788 of October 13.†

Briefly, the situation is this: President Rhee wants the Czech and Polish members of the NNSC and its inspection teams out of his territory. In South Korea there have been public demonstrations against the Commission and some attempts to do bodily harm to Communist representatives. While Mr. Rhee was visiting the United States last July, Mr. Dulles promised him that the United States would continue to press the Swiss and Swedes to withdraw their representatives and so bring about an orderly termination of the Commission. Mr. Dulles also stated publicly that the United States was sympathetic to the abandonment of the NNSC.

The Swiss and Swedes have given no indication that they are prepared to withdraw from the Commission before the Korean item is debated in the General Assembly. (Our latest information concerning their respective positions is contained in Stockholm and Berne telegrams No. 31 of October 8† and No. 49 of October 12† respectively, copies of which are attached). Therefore, the State Department, under South Korean and Pentagon pressure for quick action, has sought the approval of Mr. Dulles for a plan by which those governments represented on the Group of Sixteen would suggest in concert to the Swiss and Swedish governments that they withdraw their representatives from North Korea to the demilitarized zone. Such action would permit the United Nations Command to usher the Czechs and Poles out of South Korea to the same zone. This proposal was communicated by the State Department to Old Commonwealth representatives, who were informed that it would probably be put to the Group of Sixteen very shortly.

We disliked the proposal because we thought inter alia:

(a) that our membership on the International Supervisory Commissions in Indochina would be sufficient in itself to preclude us from joining in a concerted approach to the Swiss and Swedes;

(b) that rather than abandon the Commission, an attempt should be made to widen its powers of inspection, since precedents for freer inspections behind the Iron and/or Bamboo Curtains would be desirable;

(c) that the execution of the plan would have bad effects in neutral Asia, might encourage the South Koreans to try to whittle the Armistice Agreement down elsewhere, and at the Assembly might provide the Soviet Delegation with a good opportunity to charge the UNC with violation of the Armistice Agreement.

We requested the Embassy to convey our thinking on these lines to the State Department and Old Commonwealth representatives.

The State Department were not impressed and indicated that if the other governments concerned could not agree to action along the lines of their proposal, the United States might order the UNC unilaterally to remove the Communist members of the NNSC from South Korea. As for the rest, our Embassy reports that only the Australians have been instructed to approach the State Department, and their position is very similar to ours.

The latest development is that, without convening a meeting of the Sixteen and with knowledge of our position, the State Department has asked whether the United Kingdom and France would join them in an approach to the Swiss and Swedes on behalf of the Sixteen to win acceptance of their plan concerning the NNSC.²³

The United Kingdom position has been that while they would welcome the withdrawal of the Swiss and Swedes from the Commission, they did not think any unilateral denunciation should be made which, especially in view of the manner in which the Korean item ended at Geneva, would play directly into Communist hands. Early in September, however, on being informed that the United States would make further approaches to the Swiss and Swedes requesting their immediate withdrawal, and on being urged by the State Department to join them in making similar approaches, the British requested the Swiss and Swedes to take an immediate decision, without suggesting what this should be or asking them to withdraw from the Commission immediately. We have no information as to British thinking on the latest State Department proposal.

The French, on the other hand, have made representations to the Swiss and Swedes against the premature dissolution of the Commission. They have been worried lest its dissolution through the departure of these representatives might cause the Polish members of the Commissions in Indochina to make difficulties, and that, out of sympathy with their treatment in Korea, the Indian members might adopt a line more favourable to the Communists than they would otherwise. The French were also concerned about the possible repercussions this might have on their forces in northern Viet Nam before they were all withdrawn to Haiphong. the

²³ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

By what right would they act for the 16! L.B. Pearson

French therefore prefer that the Swiss and Swedes should postpone their withdrawal from the Commission for at least six months.

We find little merit in the arguments advanced by the State Department in opposition to the views carried in our teletype EX-1828. These arguments are not new and seem to have as their basis the idea that Mr. Rhee must be placated. Moreover, we do not think that any of them invalidate the French reasons for wanting the NNSC to continue for at least six months, which reasons seem to us basically sound.

Since our Embassy has requested further instructions from us on which to base their comments at the probable meeting of the Sixteen next week, when the State Department are expected to put forward their suggestions, you might wish to consider for despatch the attached draft teletype to Washington, repeated to our Delegation in New York and to London.

I would be grateful if you would take an early opportunity to ask a high officer of the State Department if they would be good enough to reconsider in the light of my following comments their proposal to render inoperative at an early date the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission in Korea.

2. Since my return from the Nine Power Conference in London I have reviewed the papers on this subject.²⁴ The UN Command's dissatisfaction with the restrictions placed by the North Korean authorities, and connived in by the Polish and Czech members of the NNSC, on the freedom of the inspection teams in North Korea to look into reports of military material being brought in by routes going around the fixed ports of entry is quite understandable and is appreciated. The protests made through the Military Armistice Commission were helpful in securing in the letter of the Indochina armistice agreements the promise of greater freedom for our inspection teams. We are now struggling to get maximum freedom in practice

See Chapter 3, Part 4.

— and this may be very important (a) in assisting the Laos Government to take over administration of the two northern provinces of Phongsaly and Sam Neua, where the Pathet Lao forces are being concentrated, (b) in preventing reprisals and providing freedom of movement to the Southern zone as set out in Articles 14(c) and (d) of the Vietnam agreement, and (c) in ensuring maximum freedom during the Vietnam elections which the Geneva Conference has set for July 1956. I believe that every effort should be made to broaden the precedents for freer inspections behind the Iron and Bamboo Curtains and that the implications of the action and method of action contemplated for Korea as it may affect Indochina and other situations where international inspection has been proposed should be very carefully thought through.

3. I recognize the pressure being exerted by President Syngman Rhee for curtailing the activities of the Czech and Polish members of the NNSC in South Korea. These representatives cannot obtain a fraction of the intelligence that North Korean spies can pick up. Also, the psychological aspects of the problem is important but perhaps some other means than dissolution can be found of deflecting Rhee's anger. If he succeeds in upsetting this part of the Armistice Agreement he may turn his attention to other parts of it. My inclination would be not to tamper with the Agreement at this time.

4. Possibly the United States Government has given President Rhee some assurance that it will take some action before long. I recognize that the argument can be made that the Korean Armistice has now been sufficiently stabilized so that action to render the NNSC inoperative would probably not upset the Armistice. Nevertheless, I am not in favour of such action being taken even if the problem could be regarded as a purely Korean one. In any event, because of Canadian membership on the International Supervisory Commissions in Indochina, whose functions are somewhat similar to those of the NNSC, the Canadian Government could not be associated with any concerted approach to the Swiss and Swedish governments to get them to withdraw their representatives, nor could it be a party to any authorization to the UN Command to evict the Czech and Polish representatives from South Korea.

5. If, taking into account the views outlined above, the United States Government, with the support of some other governments, is still determined to go ahead with taking some action, I would be grateful if consideration could be given to the following suggestion regarding procedure. I think that the most constructive way of dealing with this problem, if it is felt that some action must be taken, would be for the UN Command representative to introduce in the Military Armistice Commission proposed amendments to the terms of reference of the NNSC with, say, a six months time limit for their substantial adoption and implementation. The amendments proposed might give the NNSC at least the freedoms promised in Indochina and there might be detailed rules of procedure appended that ensured that the Swiss and Swedish members' enquiries were not blocked by the Czechs and Poles. The introduction of these proposed amendments in the MAC should help to keep the Korean action from affecting adversely the working of the Indochina Commissions. Six months time would be given to consolidate the Armistice in Indochina and to secure maximum freedom for the inspection teams there. I would hope, also, that President Rhee would be satisfied that the introduction of these amendments with a time limit represented sufficiently vigorous implementation of any assurances given him.

6. If the United States Government accepts the suggestions outlined in the preceding paragraph, we would be prepared to have a Canadian representative join them and any other interested government representatives in drawing up on a confidential basis proposed amendments to the terms of reference of the NNSC and implementing rules of procedure.

7. Please inform Embassies of old Commonwealth and French governments when these representations have been made. I hope that these views can be conveyed before the meeting of the Group of Fifteen. If not, please speak along these lines at the meeting.

FUTURE OF N.N.S.C.

The views contained in your telegram under reference on the United States proposals concerning the NNSC were given on October 20 to Everett Drumright, the Deputy Assistant Secretary for Far Eastern Affairs. He noted the views and said they would be taken into account but we suspect that they will not lead to any significant change in the United States attitude on the matter.

2. After listening to the views which we put forward Drumright advanced the United States arguments which were dealt with in some detail in our despatch No. 1743 of October 6.† Drumright indicated the strong belief of the State Department that an action such as that proposed by the United States with respect to the NNSC would have a salutary effect on the Polish members of the Indo-China Supervisory Commissions. Turning a blind eye to known contraventions of the armistice agreement in Korea could only confirm Communist powers generally in their belief that they could ignore international commitments of this sort with impunity. It was the United States opinion that now was the time for firm action to disabuse them of this idea. In the United States opinion the first beneficiaries of relatively strong action by our side would be the Indo-China Supervisory Commissions.

3. In commenting on your suggestion for action through the Military Armistice Committee, Drumright expressed the opinion that any attempt to amend the terms of reference of the NNSC would, in fact, involve amending the Korean armistice agreement as a whole. The State Department is of the opinion that the Communists would either refuse to negotiate or would spin the negotiations out indefinitely. Any attempt to attack the problem in this fashion would, in the State Department's opinion, lead to repetition of the dreary negotiations of Panmunjom which would not meet the point at issue and which might conceivably create larger problems with respect to the armistice agreement.

4. Drumright buttressed these two main arguments with additional arguments which might be mentioned summarily:

(a) The United States Government was not acting in this matter simply as a result of pressure exerted by President Rhee but also because of the views of the United Nations Command; and also because it, as a government, was convinced that Communist flouting of international responsibilities could not be endured indefinitely.

(b) The United States Government had every reason to believe that the Swiss and Swedish Governments were anxious to be rid of the tasks which they had assumed in Korea and would respond favourably to any definite action initiated by the UNC.

(c) The United States Government was convinced from the information which it had received that the Czech and Polish members of the NNSC in South Korea were obtaining substantial intelligence which could not be duplicated by North Korean espionage agents.

5. Drumright said that he was not certain now when the United States proposal would be put before the sixteen, although he implied that it would be in the very near future. We have learned that the United States proposal to the United Kingdom and French Governments which was dealt with in our telegram WA-1788 of October 13[†] has neither been rejected or accepted as yet. Presumably the State Department will wish to have definite answers from these two governments before proceeding with a meeting of the sixteen.

6. The substance of your telegram under reference was given to the State Department, Old Commonwealth Embassies and the French Embassy as an "oral memorandum" i.e. an unsigned summary of your telegram.

KOREA — FUTURE OF NNSC

Following from USSEA, Begins: We remain as unimpressed by State Department arguments in favour of their proposal relating to the NNSC as they seem to be by our arguments against it.

2. Therefore, should the State Department put forward their proposal at an early meeting of the Sixteen, you should stand with one exception on the views we have set out in our teletypes EX-1905 of October 19 and EX-1828 of October 4.[†] That exception concerns the State Department assertion that the Czech and Polish members of the NNSC in South Korea were obtaining “substantial intelligence which could not be duplicated by North Korean espionage agents”. Since the Americans are now echoing the same line as the South Koreans on this issue, we cannot very well challenge its factual basis. However, you might meet this assertion obliquely by suggesting as a possibility that means consistent with the Armistice Agreement might be available to the United Nations Command to prevent the Czechs and Poles from engaging in further important espionage activities.

3. Presumably the next meeting of the Sixteen will provide representatives of members other than France and the old Commonwealth with their first opportunity to learn about the State Department plan; the representatives of certain countries will probably wish to refer the proposal back to their governments before commenting on it to any extent. The meeting might therefore develop in a manner which would enable you to avoid taking the lead in criticizing the proposal. We would hope so. Nevertheless, you should make clear to the meeting that we are not anxious to join in any concerted approach to the Swiss and Swedish governments along the lines the State Department envisage. If the United States should in the end decide to take unilateral action to render the NNSC inoperative, we might have to reserve our position and retain the right to explain it publicly if necessary. However, it would seem too early as yet for us to set forth our position in such rigid terms. We prefer to deal with the matter one step at a time, and the next step is the meeting of the Sixteen.

4. For your own very confidential information, we are reliably informed that the Senior Member of the UNC component of the Military Armistice Commission has suggested to the Commander-in-Chief UNC that the MAC itself should be dissolved and its work taken over by a Joint Secretariat. His view is that the MAC has served its purpose and has nothing further to accomplish. He has also recommended that if this proposal prove unacceptable to the Communist side of the MAC, then the UNC should take unilateral action and leave only secretaries at Munsan-Ni or Seoul. It would seem that any decision on this proposal will be deferred pending action relating to the NNSC. Meanwhile, the UNC has ordered UNC representatives on the Joint Observer Teams to deny categorically all Communist charges of ground violation by our side, and its members on the MAC to resist any Communist suggestion that such incidents be investigated by the NNSC.

5. Recently for the first time in many months the NNSC was able to file a unanimous report with the MAC. This does not necessarily mean that the NNSC is now operating in North Korea as efficiently as the Swiss and Swedes would wish but it does indicate an improvement in relations on the Commission and any such improvement would seem to make a negative contribution to the ease with which the Swiss and Swedes can withdraw from the Commission on the terms the Americans wish. Ends.

FUTURE OF THE NNSC

I attended the meeting on Thursday, November 18, convened by the State Department to discuss an approach to the Swiss and Swedish Governments concerning the NNSC. Murphy, the Deputy Under-Secretary, was in the Chair.

2. Murphy opened the meeting with an outline of the United States views on the subject. He said that tensions were increasing in the Republic of Korea by reason of the presence of Polish and Czech members of the NNSC who were engaged in "sabotage and espionage" in South Korea. Whether everyone agreed or not with the ROK point of view on the matter it was essential to deal with the facts of the situation as they were. The UNC could be put in an untenable position if violence were to occur. The original thought of the United States had been to try to get agreement among the fifteen interested governments for an approach to the Swiss and Swedish Governments with a suggestion that they should withdraw their representatives from the inspection teams in Korea. In the course of discussion with other governments a compromise plan had been broached which Murphy hoped would carry the "community point of view".

3. Murphy proposed for the consideration of the meeting the scheme which has been dealt with in earlier correspondence and which would involve,

(a) An approach by the Swiss and Swedish representatives on the NNSC to the Military Armistice Commission reporting that the NNSC was unable to function because of Communist intransigence,

(b) An approach by the Swiss and Swedish representatives to the Military Armistice Commission with a view to developing new procedures or amending the terms of reference of the NNSC,

(c) Notification by the Swiss and Swedish representatives that pending action by the MAC the Swiss and Swedish representatives on the inspection teams would be withdrawn to the demilitarized zone. According to Murphy the inspection teams could not then operate and the Poles and the Czechs would have to leave South Korean territory. He suggested that if the plan could be approved by the interested governments the United States, the United Kingdom and France might make representations to the Swiss and Swedish Governments on behalf of the group. Finally he underscored the urgency of the situation as the United States saw it.

4. Since discussion and questioning of the United States proposal was somewhat desultory I thought I should state our position at some length. I said that Canada recognized the factual basis of the United States anxiety, i.e. the Czech and Polish members were violating the spirit of the terms of reference of the NNSC, that the Swiss and Swedish members could not discharge their mandate in North Korea, and finally that the United Nations command had legitimate grounds for anxiety over the state of affairs in South Korea. On the other hand I stressed your anxiety concerning the consequences that a cessation of activity on the part of the NNSC might have for Canada in its unique position arising out of service on the Indo-China Commissions. I spoke of your concern lest grounds be given for Communist contentions that the United Nations side had violated the armistice. I mentioned in addition your view on the usefulness of maintaining inspection teams behind the various Communist curtains even if they were not completely effective.

5. I attempted by my questioning to shift the emphasis in the United States proposal from the withdrawal of the inspection teams to the action through the Military Armistice Commission to produce a new mandate for the Supervisory Commission. I hope I was successful in leaving this emphasis in the minds of representatives at the meeting. Murphy agreed that the proposal involved two stages. The first would be direct demarche to the Military Armistice Commission on a confidential basis by the Swiss and Swedish representatives indicating that the NNSC terms of reference and their implementation were not good enough. At the same time notice would be given of intention to withdraw Swiss and Swedish representatives from the inspection teams. While he agreed that the communication of protest to the MAC would precede the withdrawal, I do not believe that the United States envisages any lapse of time between the "two stages".

6. Murphy made it clear that in the United States view some approach should be made to the Swiss and Swedish Governments in the very near future before these governments had come to any firm conclusions as to whether the matter should be brought up in the General Assembly. He mentioned specifically that something should be done before November 29 when the Korean item was likely to be considered by the General Assembly.

7. There was a good deal of discussion as the difficulties of forcing the withdrawal of the Czech and Polish members of the Commission and inspection teams even if the Swiss and Swedes indicated their intention to withdraw to the neutralized zone. Murphy said that in the United States view the inspection teams without Swiss and Swedish participation would legally be "in a non-operating condition" and the UNC could edge them out of South Korea, e.g. by tampering with or cutting off logistic support. This situation worried the Belgian Ambassador particularly.

8. No representative at the meeting offered direct opposition to the United States proposal. The United Kingdom and French representatives indicated the willingness of their governments to act as spokesmen for the group in any approach to the Swiss and Swedish Governments. Some representatives such as the Greeks gave wholehearted support to the United States position. The Australian and New Zealand representatives were non-committal but certainly not opposed. The New Zealand representative suggested that the next step might be to approach the Swiss and Swedish Governments informally with an inquiry as to what they would think of a course of action such as that outlined in the United States proposal. Murphy agreed that this would be a logical step.

9. I found it difficult to object to an approach to the two governments on the basis of an informal inquiry as to their opinions and suggested that when that inquiry was made the results could be reported back to the group. I stressed the desirability of keeping these communications secret and everyone agreed. The Belgian representative suggested that at the next meeting some firmer indication of what we would do if the Czech and Polish members of the inspection teams refused to move should be spelled out.

10. I believe that Canada is not committed one way or the other at this stage to support the scheme. I think at the next meeting of the group we should be in a position to make some suggestions as to what amendments might be put forward in the Military Armistice Commission. The compromise scheme put forward by the Americans is, I am sure, considered by other interested representatives to be made up in part of a Canadian idea. A certain responsibility it would seem, therefore, lies with us to make suggestions as to useful and effective amendment of the terms of the armistice agreement. I believe that no member of the group will oppose the suggestion completely. I got the impression from my telephone conversation with Mr. Holmes yesterday that you would wish the way left open for you to reserve the Canadian position at the end of the exercise if that seemed desirable. I believe I was able to do that. The nature of the "inquiry" to the Swiss and Swedes will, of course, be important and I shall make every effort to keep you informed of the exact terms of the inquiry. Finally, I think early attention should be given to working out detailed Canadian views on the proposal as a whole for I believe that action will be pressed vigorously by the United States Government and the next meeting may be called in the near future.

KOREA — FUTURE OF THE NNSC

You have asked for an expression of my views concerning the compromise proposal which Murphy explained to the meeting of Fifteen on November 18 and which attracted general support.

2. The new proposal, by providing for the introduction of amendments to the terms of reference of the NNSC which might enable the problem to be dealt with in a constructive way, goes a considerable distance towards meeting the objections I posed to the original scheme and I welcome its acceptance by the United States Government. I can well understand the compulsions arising from the situation in South Korea with which that Government must cope and in the changed circumstances would not wish to add to their difficulties by continuing to press for the adoption of all the suggestions set out in my EX-1905 of October 19, or by taking the lead among the Fifteen in opposing any aspect of the proposal. The Poles and Czechs have clearly used their position not only to frustrate the purposes of the NNSC, but also to pervert it. Since they have created an intolerable situation, there would seem some justice in their having to suffer the consequences.

3. I still have my doubts, however, about the State Department view that the first beneficiaries of unilateral action by the United Nations side in Korea to render the NNSC inoperative would be the International Supervisory Commissions in Indo-China. I remain of the opinion that such action is liable to increase the difficulties with which we have to contend there and that if we are associated with it, the adverse effects might be worse. I admit, however, that if the Swedes and Swiss were to agree to the proposal and could take the required action without giving the appearance of succumbing to pressure from our side, then perhaps the increase in our difficulties and the undesirable consequences of our association with the proposal might not be so great. Whether the State Department view is the correct one, of course, can only be determined after the event when the Polish, Viet Minh, and more particularly the Indian, reactions become known. While I am not now disposed to try to dissuade either the United States or other Governments concerned from supporting the compromise scheme, I would hope for their sympathetic understanding of the uniqueness of our position in the Group of Fifteen, resulting from the commitments we have undertaken in Indochina in the general interest.

4. Whatever the Swiss and Swedish views on the proposal may be, I doubt very much if we should associate ourselves with the rest of the Group in supporting the proposal. We might better remain benevolently aloof. The proposal as I understand it does not require our adherence to be put into effect, and provided we explain our stand to our friends solely in terms of our involvement in Indochina, they should not regard us as being obstructive. We do not block but stand aside for reasons peculiar to ourselves. By remaining uncommitted we would be free to put as constructive an interpretation as possible on any action vis-à-vis the NNSC to which the United States and the rest of our friends would be parties, consistent with protecting our position. Moreover, we might then better serve the general interest in Indochina as well as our own.

5. I should be grateful if you would informally discuss these views with the State Department and your French and Old Commonwealth colleagues. As an earnest of our good intention, you might also pass on my views on the question of amendments to the terms of reference of the NNSC. For your own information, I see virtually no prospect of amendments being devised which would be acceptable to the other side and to the ROK, but nevertheless consider the effort should be made.

6. I think that any amendments to the terms of reference of the NNSC, which the UNC may introduce for consideration in the MAC, should have for their objective the enabling of the Commission and its instruments to fulfil the purposes for which they were created, namely, the supervision of those provisions of the Armistice Agreement which prohibit the introduction into Korea of re-enforcing military men and material and the special inspections relating to violations of the agreement which they may be requested to conduct outside the de-militarized zone by either side of the MAC.

7. The essence of the problem would seem to be the veto power which the Communist members of the Commission have over its functioning. The inability of inspecting personnel to move about in North Korea in the pursuit of their duties as much as desirable would appear to be largely a corollary of this. Thus, no inspection team can decide to move unless its Communist members agree. This appreciation of why the NNSC has been ineffective would seem to accord with both that of the Swedish and Swiss and of the Americans. Thus, in their letter of May 4, 1954, Generals Mohn and Gross, the Swedish and Swiss members of the Commission stated that its operations were hampered by the equal division of votes, resulting in deadlock, and that the control activities of the fixed teams in North Korea were not satisfactory "owing to the restricted practices imposed on the activities of the teams by their Czechoslovak and Polish members." In his speech to the Geneva Conference of June 5, Bedell Smith quoted, with approval, appropriate sections from their letter to this effect.

8. The Communists could be deprived of their veto power in the Commission if its membership were to be increased by one non-Communist state or decreased by one Communist state. I am inclined to prefer the latter approach to the problem. If an increase were proposed, the other side could declare itself in favour of India, to the embarrassment of our side, since India would be unacceptable to the ROK. Moreover, the establishment of a five-member Commission and five-member Inspection Teams could give rise to extra administrative problems. To effect a decrease, the proper tactics might be to suggest that the Commission should consist of three members, two of whom would be holdovers, say Poland and Sweden, and the third to be agreed upon. The UNC might then work for agreement on Switzerland as a country with first-hand experience in the work to be performed. The Communists could still nominate India, but our side would be in a better position in that it could opt for Switzerland.

9. If the veto problem is solved and a majority of the Commission is truly neutral, then it might be left to the Commission to adopt such rules of procedure for itself and its inspecting teams as it may consider necessary for the performance of its duties. If the reformed Commission thinks that its terms of reference, as now laid down, require modification to ensure adequate rules of procedure then, under Paragraph 49 of the Armistice Agreement, it may recommend appropriate amendments to the MAC in the interests of a more effective armistice. There, of course, the Communists could block any such recommendations. Adequate rules of procedure would allow the requisite freedom of movement provided neither Command interfered. So far, the Communist Command has been able to leave responsibility for interference to the Czechs and Poles but they have derived their power from the veto. Therefore, it might be desirable to consider the terms of reference with a view to so amending them that any interference from, or even failure to co-operate by, the Communist Command with the Commission, would be a breach of the Armistice Agreement and the Commission would clearly have the right of untrammelled movement in its work.

10. Sub-paragraphs 13(c) and (d) of the Agreement provide for inspections at designated ports of entry. If re-enforcements of men and material enter Korea elsewhere they do so in violation of the Agreement. Paragraph 28 permits either side of the MAC to request the NNSC to conduct inspections where such side considers a violation to have taken place and sub-paragraph 42(f) provides that these inspections will be conducted without delay. I think that it might be especially written into the Agreement that the NNSC, through its inspecting personnel, may go anywhere in Korea outside the de-militarized zone, on its own initiative to check whether military material is being improperly introduced into the country. It would be incumbent on either Command to provide facilities for movement satisfactory to a majority of the inspection team.

11. If armistice violations are to be investigated properly, they must be investigated promptly. Therefore, consideration might be given as to whether the Commission should have its own transport to prevent it from being held up by the military authorities on either side.

12. You will appreciate that the suggestions above are general rather than specific because we have little first-hand information concerning the operations or the reports of the NNSC. Also, I think that the UNC, in making proposals on this matter in the MAC should rely heavily on the advice of the Swiss and Swedes, who are neutral and have long since made public their dissatisfaction with the operations of the Commission.

KOREA — FUTURE OF THE N.N.S.C.

Thank you for your telegram under reference. It is very helpful to us in our contacts with the State Department to have this fuller exposition of your thinking on this delicate and complicated matter.

2. We believe that we appreciate fully your anxiety lest any action taken with respect to the NNSC should compromise the Canadian position on the Indo-China Commissions. The Americans, as you know, do not share your view about this. Nevertheless, I think, they do now understand your motives.

3. If, as a result of the enquiry which is now being made of the Swiss and Swedish Governments, a proposal is put to us for approval (along with the other governments contributing to the UNC) which involves withdrawal of the teams from North and South Korea, it would, of course, be possible for us to "abstain" in a meeting of the fifteen. We could do this, I think, without opposing approval by the others, pleading our own unique position. The trouble would come if and when we decided that we should make our dissociation public. And this I take it we would have to do if we were to achieve such advantage as there might be in standing aside. In this connection, I should like to know what procedure you have in mind for making our position known publicly should it be decided by the others to go ahead.

4. Of course, we have still to learn of the Swiss and Swedish reactions to the enquiry being made. Such indications as we have indicate little enthusiasm in Berne for negotiation of the terms of reference of the NNSC. We should have some news this week. Presumably another meeting of the fifteen will be called when the reply is received.

5. It is difficult to determine what action we should take, particularly as to the nature of any "dissociation" on our part, until we know the Swiss and Swedish Governments' response and the reaction thereto of the United States and our other allies. Quite likely the response will be neither wholly negative nor wholly affirmative. In any event, it would be wise, I think, to defer any further conversation with the State Department until we know. Otherwise we may simply cause difficulty over a purely hypothetical situation.

6. The general suggestions which you make in paragraphs 6 to 12 of your telegram under reference concerning possible amendments to the terms of reference of the NNSC provide us with useful material for discussion with the State Department and other interested representatives. Because of the Swiss Government's request, however, that we do not raise the question of re-negotiating the terms of reference of the NNSC, I am in doubt as to whether in fact the essence of the problem is the veto power which the Communist members of the Commission hold. There seems to be desire on the part of both the Swiss and Swedish Governments to reduce substantially the burdens which they have been bearing in Korea. We feel certain that the United States, partly to meet its problems with the ROK Government, would also hope that any amendments to the terms of reference of the NNSC would result in the severe limitation of the activities of the Commission. The ROK Government itself would probably be satisfied with nothing less than amendments which would keep the NNSC within the bounds of the demilitarized zone.

7. We also foresee great difficulties in the establishment of a new three-power commission. The Swiss would not be acceptable to the Communists and India would not be acceptable to the ROK Government. For tactical purposes the Communists might well suggest the inclusion of India in the hope that the allied side could be discomfited completely. We would certainly not enjoy the experience of opting for Switzerland against India. We might well find ourselves faced with difficulties in this context worse than those which faced us prior to our attempts to amend the terms of reference.

8. With reference to paragraph 5 above, I spoke to you on the telephone this morning and you agreed that we should not, repeat not, approach the State Department until the reactions of the Swiss and Swedish Governments to the enquiry concerning the proposed procedure are known. For this reason we are deferring action upon the instructions contained in paragraph 5 of your telegram under reference.

KOREA — FUTURE OF THE NNSC

You will recall that when we noticed that the paper† which was to serve as guidance for the United States, United Kingdom, and French representatives in their concerted approach to the Swedes and Swiss regarding the NNSC went farther in indicating unanimous support for the proposal by the Fifteen than a proper appreciation of our position justified, we suggested a slight amendment of which the State Department took note. The purpose of our amendment was to leave the way open for us to dis-associate ourselves from the proposal and to reduce pressure on the Swedes and Swiss to accept it. We have since learned that the guidance paper went forward to the representatives concerned in Stockholm and Berne without amendment.

2. Our representative in Stockholm has informed us that the Swedish Government wish to know whether we are supporting the proposal. Our Ambassador in Berne reports a similar interest in our position on the part of the Swiss. Since accepting the invitation to serve on the Supervisory Commissions in Indochina we have on a number of occasions discussed with the Swedes and Swiss the functioning of the NNSC with a view to obtaining the benefit of their experience. In these discussions our attitude concerning the relationship between the operations of the NNSC in Korea and those of the Supervisory Commissions in Indochina has come out. Because of this it is incumbent on us now to explain our position vis-à-vis the proposal on which their views had been sought by the Americans, British, and French. Moreover, I think we must tell them that while we agreed an inquiry should be made, we could not associate ourselves in any way with pressure being put on them since, having not dissimilar responsibilities in Indochina, we would not wish pressure to be put on us. I might add that we have at no time made representations to either the Swedes or the Swiss as to what they should do concerning continued representation on the NNSC.

3. I am sending a telegram to our representatives in Berne and Stockholm informing them of the lines along which they might speak in confidence to the local authorities on this matter. This telegram will be repeated to you.

4. In the changed circumstances I should be grateful if you would now take up informally with the State Department and your French and Old Commonwealth colleagues the views I have set out in my teletype EX-2185 of November 27. You should also tell them that we are informing the Swiss and Swedes of our position relating to the proposal the latter now have under consideration.

5. In Paragraph 3 of your teletype under reference you inquire as to the procedure I have in mind for making our position known to the public if that action should become necessary. I cannot anticipate the developments likely to occur. FUTURE OF THE NNSC

Concerning this matter you might wish to speak in confidence to the appropriate local authorities along the following lines:

We have long since recognized that the Polish and Czech representatives on the NNSC and its subsidiary bodies have used their position not only to frustrate the purposes of the NNSC but also to pervert it. As a result of this behaviour both their Swiss and Swedish colleagues and the United Nations Command have for some time been faced with an intolerable situation. We thought that a constructive approach to the problem might be for the UNC to propose in the Military Armistice Commission, with a time limit for their acceptance, amendments to the Armistice Agreement which would have two objectives — the removal from the Czechs and Poles of their veto power and the assurance of freedom of movement for the inspection teams of the Commission. During the period allotted for renegotiation we suggested that the NNSC be permitted to function as usual. This delay would give us some time to consolidate precedents in the International Supervisory Commissions in Indochina.

3. The United States Government, however, while willing to authorize the UNC to try to renegotiate in the MAC the terms of reference of the Commission, (the nature of the amendments to be proposed by the UNC was not revealed), wanted the withdrawal of NNSC inspecting personnel to the Demilitarized Zone pending the outcome of these negotiations. At the November 18 meeting in Washington of the Group of Fifteen, the United States representatives proposed this scheme for consideration and found no direct opposition to it. Our representative reserved our position while agreeing to an informal inquiry to the Swiss and Swedish Governments as to their opinions on the proposal. Our understanding was that this inquiry would entail no pressure on such Governments to agree with the scheme.

4. Since we are the only members of the Group of Fifteen with responsibilities in Indochina, (responsibilities not unlike those which the Swiss and Swedes have undertaken in Korea) we do not wish to urge any action relating to the NNSC on the Swiss and Swedes nor to be a party to any unilateral action to render the Commission inoperative. Nevertheless we expect that Swiss and Swedish concurrence in the procedure they now have under consideration would not greatly increase the difficulties with which we have to contend in Indochina.

5. Our position vis-à-vis the proposal might be described as benevolently aloof and derives solely from our involvement in Indochina. By standing aside for reasons peculiar to ourselves we hope better to serve the general interest in Indochina.

FUTURE OF THE NNSC

We put the views contained in your telegram under reference and EX-2185 of November 27 to Jones at the Korea Desk in the State Department. Unfortunately, we had not seen the instructions to our representatives in Berne and Stockholm forwarded to us in EX-2207 of December 3. Jones was glad to have this latest exposition of your views since, from some source which he did not identify, he had heard that Canada was "using back-door influence" on the Swiss and Swedes.

2. He agreed that our "abstentionist" attitude to the Swiss and Swedish enquiry was in line with the Canadian position explained at the meeting of the fifteen on November 18 (WA-1977 of November 18). His only concern was that the Canadian failure to comment one way or the other on the scheme which had been put to the Swiss and Swedes might tip the delicate balance which the State Department believes exists at the moment between acceptance or rejection of the compromise scheme by the Swiss and Swedish governments. Jones said that the Swedish statement in the U.N.'s first Committee on December 2 (Candel's telegram No. 735 to Ottawa)[†] was interpreted by the State Department as something in the nature of a cautiously drawn final balance sheet which, taken together with past warnings about the situation from the Swiss and Swedish representatives on the NNSC, prepared the way for Swiss and Swedish withdrawal from their heavy burdens in Korea — possibly through acceptance of a scheme along the lines of that which they had been asked by the fifteen to examine.

3. Carrying on with this point Jones referred to the explanation we had given him of your views set out in paragraph 3 of EX-2185 of November 27. He said he could respect your view (without agreeing with it) that unilateral action in Korea to render the NNSC inoperative might increase Canadian difficulties in Indo-China. At the same time he noted, however, that you might regard as less undesirable, action taken by the Swiss and Swedes which did not give the appearance of succumbing to pressure from our side. For that reason it had occurred to him that you might regard it as in the Canadian interest to encourage mildly at least Swiss and Swedish acceptance of the compromise scheme. He did not believe that the present approach to the Swiss and Swedes could properly be termed "pressure", since none of the fifteen governments were in a position to force the Swiss and Swedes to do anything and he added rather ruefully that the Swiss and Swedes realized this "all too well". Some action on Korea was essential, however, and if the Swiss and Swedes did not accept the compromise scheme, the State Department would be unable to stand against the opinion of other interested United States authorities. In these circumstances, unilateral action by the United Nations Command might well be authorized.

4. Jones repeated the United States views on the effect which action in Korea might have on the work of the Supervisory Commissions in Indo-China. These views are well known to you. Jones did, however, add one new argument. He believed that the Viet-Minh (and their Polish voice on the Commission) were operating on the premise that, if events took their natural course, South Viet-Nam would fall to the Communists by "fair" elections. If this estimate of the Viet-Minh attitude was correct, the Communist aim would surely be to allow the International Commission to operate reasonably effectively. In the final analysis they would then claim some element of international support for their peaceful victory. Nevertheless, they would be only as reasonable as they had to be. Action in Korea to prove that the free world (and the representatives of two widely acknowledged neutrals) could not forever remain patient in the face of Communist double-dealing, combined with firm and objective supervision in Indo-China, would, in the United States view, cause the Poles and the Viet-Minh to take an even more reasonable line. They would wish to furnish as few excuses as possible for the free world to charge violation of the Geneva Agreement and thereby to upset what the Communists probably already regarded as a "sure bet".

5. Jones hinted that, since both Mr. Pearson and Mr. Dulles were likely to be in New York over the weekend, an opportunity might arise for discussion of the subject between them. We have not had an opportunity to pass your views on to all our Commonwealth colleagues as yet but we will do that as soon as possible.

6. Our rather inconclusive discussion with Jones of possible amendments to the terms of reference of the NNSC will be reported in a separate message.†

Today, Jarring told us Swedes do not expect to reply to the proposal (mentioned?) immediately. Debates and resolutions in New York alter the position and makes the suggestion for amendment of NNSC appear inappropriate at this time. While no governmental decision taken Jarring considers December 2 statement on NNSC by the Swedish delegates in the General Assembly will eventually require amendment of the terms of reference or the Swedish withdrawal. They would still appreciate any comment you feel you can make on paragraph 2 of our telegram No. 45 of December 4.†

2. Resulting from the debate in New York and the Chinese reaction of the United States-Formosa agreement Swedes expect the Korean problem to be active over the next few weeks and are worried whether serious developments may not take place which would jeopardize the whole armistice agreement and completely change Sweden's position as member of NNSC.

KOREA — FUTURE OF NNSC

1. On Friday, December 10th, Luy of Political Department informed us United States had made second démarche to Zehnder, Secretary General of Political Department. I have reason to believe that among suggestions made was a proposal that Swiss and Swedes (a) withdraw to demilitarized zone, (b) reduce strength of their delegation, and (c) maintain liaison officers in South Korea while Poles and Czechs maintain liaison with North Korea.

2. Luy said that Zehnder wondered if United States was acting alone and asked if we had anything on the 15 power meeting in Washington. As neither American, British nor French in Berne had informed us of their approach to the Swiss Government concerning joint proposal, MacLellan thought it in best Canadian interests to let Zehnder see copy of Washington's telegram No. 1977 of November 18th.

3. Luy informed us Monday evening that Federal Council on Monday, December 13th, decided on Swiss action which from hint given to us may be as follows:

(1) No reply is to be made to American, British, French proposal.

(2) Aide mémoire will be addressed to Washington and Peking suggesting reduction of numerical strength of NNSC but no withdrawal to demilitarization zone.

(3) Swiss have now passed this aide mémoire to Stockholm to see if Swedes wish to join Swiss in this action.

(4) Aide mémoire will probably be later this week as soon as Swedish opinion is obtained. We have been promised copy.

KOREA — FUTURE OF THE NNSC

The following views may be communicated informally and confidentially to the appropriate Swiss and Swedish authorities on procedural problems confronting us in Indochina.

2. To carry out the Armistice provisions we think the Commissions there and their subordinate bodies require freedom of inspection, movement and inquiry. If these are to obtain and the business of the Commissions advanced with efficiency, then there must be reasonable harmony within the Commissions and between them and the local authorities. We hope to avoid at least until the Armistice becomes better established the hardening of lines which would entail the Commissions' failing to carry out their intended responsibilities. This hope may best be realized if the various representatives continue to pay deference to the independent attitude required by the spirit of the Geneva Agreements. It may be thwarted however if the approach of the representatives of any country concerned were to become clearly open to question in this respect. Although the Polish representatives have no veto power, they have a great capacity for intransigence. As for the Vietminh, it is important that they should not have reason to think themselves on better ground to withhold the co-operation needed.

3. While we cannot prophesy what would be the effects on the armistice supervisory machinery in Indochina of the NNSC becoming even more ineffective, we think that the problems in both are sufficiently related that any significant development concerning the NNSC may have effects on the other. The extent to which these will be adverse will largely depend on how a change is made in the operations of the NNSC. Since the proposal recently put forward seems to provide for a solution which would neither do violence to the Armistice Agreement, nor be inconsistent with previously expressed views of the Swiss and Swedes concerning NNSC inadequacies, we have informed you that their concurrence in the procedure would not greatly increase our difficulties. The Swiss and Swedes, having long since made public their dissatisfaction with the working of the Commission, have a responsibility to do what they can to right the situation. It is in our interest that they exercise this responsibility. One basic element in the problem which cannot be ignored is Rhee's insistence that the Czechs and Poles get out of South Korea and the United States promise to do something about this. The Swedes and Swiss must take cognizance of this aspect of the problem if they are to deal with the main difficulties facing the Commission. In the meantime there is a danger of violence to Commission personnel in South Korea.

4. For your own information we do not want to go beyond the above in acquainting the Swiss and Swedes with our views on the NNSC and in giving them advice as to what they might decide concerning continued participation. While we understand the reluctance of the Swiss and Swedes to move when such move may be interpreted as succumbing to pressure from South Korea or the United Nations side, we do not want them to be able to use the Canadian position vis-à-vis the NNSC as a means of resisting this pressure. We agreed only to go along with an enquiry. We asked you to explain our position to them and to say that we did not wish to be associated with the application of pressure to have the proposed course of action outlined in the enquiry accepted. It would not accord with this position if we were now to be caught in a cross-fire between the rest of the Fifteen and the Swedes and Swiss over action relating to the future of the NNSC.

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], October 11, 1954

FUTURE OF UNKRA

In a memorandum to Cabinet dated October 4 you make proposals concerning future Canadian contributions to various United Nations relief and assistance programmes — among them, the UNKRA programme.²⁵ The UNKRA section of the memorandum mentions the efforts made in recent months to improve UNKRA's financial position and refers more specifically to a United States proposal for a reduced total programme for 1954-55 of $44.9 million. This proposal involves a contribution of $9.9 million from the United Kingdom, Australia and Canada, of which $7 million would be met from the unpaid portion of previous United Kingdom and Australian pledges and the remaining $2.9 million from possible increased contributions by the three countries. You are suggesting to Cabinet that an additional $750,000 would be an appropriate Canadian share of the approximately $3 million gap to be filled if the United States proposal is to be made workable. The memorandum further notes that the United Kingdom and Australia are to be asked whether they would also be prepared to increase their original pledges to help fill this gap.

The purpose of this memorandum is to acquaint you with the present United Kingdom and Australian positions (as reported by our Delegation to the General Assembly) and to seek your approval for a proposed joint approach to the United Kingdom by Australia and Canada with a view to securing an increase in their original pledge.

The United Kingdom Position

Our Delegation to the General Assembly reports that the United Kingdom would be prepared to pay the balance of their pledge provided their contribution does not exceed 17.5 per cent of total contributions past and present. 17.5 per cent of total UNKRA receipts to date ($123 million) is $21.5 million. In fact, the United Kingdom has already paid $22.5 million (out of their original pledge of $28 million) or approximately 18.3 per cent of total receipts. The implication of the present United Kingdom stand is that their original pledge will only be paid when total contributions amount to $160 million, and that it will take additional contributions amounting to more than $6 million before any additional United Kingdom contribution can be contemplated. Since the United States contribution now represents 68.6 per cent of total pledges and since pledges from all other countries (excluding United States and United Kingdom) amount to $3.1 million (Australia $1.5 million, other countries $1.6 million), the United Kingdom decision is tantamount to a refusal to contribute anything more at this time to UNKRA.

The Australian Position

While Australia is willing to pay the balance of its original pledge of $4 million (i.e. $1.5 million), there has been until very recently an obstacle in the way of further consideration by the Australian Cabinet of an increase in its original pledge. This obstacle was due to the fact that UNKRA had not expended to any substantial extent the credits deposited in Canberra in favour of the agency. However, latest reports from our Delegation in New York indicate that this obstacle is likely to be removed if a proposal of the Agent General of UNKRA to purchase $2 million worth of Australian wool goes through. On this assumption, the Australian Delegate in New York has expressed the personal opinion that the Australian Cabinet — being seriously concerned over the political implications of a hurried winding up of the UNKRA programme — might go as far as increasing its pledge irrespective of the United Kingdom position, provided the United States and Canada persisted in their positive approach to the problem.

The United States position continues to be that they are ready to match any future payments provided the United States contribution does not exceed 65 per cent of total receipts. As mentioned above, their contribution now represents 68.6 per cent; thus it will be impossible for the Administration to recommend an additional contribution to UNKRA in the President's budget message next January unless the United States contribution is brought down to 65 per cent by the end of the year.

The restrictive position taken by the United Kingdom during the informal discussions between the United States, United Kingdom, Australia and ourselves in New York has led the other three to wonder whether the implications of their stand have been fully thought out by all concerned including the Foreign Office. This situation has prompted the Australian Delegate to suggest that Australia and Canada might approach the United Kingdom, preferably at a high level, with a view to persuading them to increase their original pledge in proportion to possible similar Australian and Canadian increases. The United States Delegation has approved this idea of a joint approach but has regretted that the United States could not participate in view of their recent démarches in London and New York.

It should perhaps be mentioned here that while another $11.4 million will be required to permit the United States to pay the balance (i.e. $8.6 million) of their pledge this year, only $4.7 million from other countries are actually required to bring the United States percentage to 65 per cent. The United States Delegation has indicated that if additional contributions in the latter amount or more were received by UNKRA — either through payment of all or part of the United Kingdom balance of $5.5 million or by additional payments by the United Kingdom, Australia and Canada — they might suggest to the Administration that the United States make what might be called an "advance payment" which might be announced at a possible pledging conference to be held during the General Assembly session.

In view of the considerations set forth above, and on the assumption that Cabinet is in agreement with your recommendation concerning a Canadian contribution contingent on parallel and proportionate contributions by Australia and the United Kingdom, would you agree with the proposal for a joint Australian-Canadian approach to the United Kingdom with a view to persuading them not only to pay the balance of their pledge but also to make some additional contribution proportionate to possible additional payments by ourselves and Australia.²⁶

Your recommendation to Cabinet was framed in consultation with officials of the Department of Finance. In view of the recent advice we have received, however, it is clear that we may face the possibility that the United Kingdom Government will not contemplate a new and additional contribution. In order to avoid a further reference of this matter to Cabinet, the question arises whether Cabinet would be prepared to agree to authorize an increase of $750,000 in our pledge if the United States and Australia alone are prepared to make similar additional contributions.²⁷

There are informal indications that the Australian Government might decide to increase its pledge if two main contributors act similarly. So far as the United Kingdom is concerned, should the effort to secure an additional and proportionate contribution be unsuccessful, the secondary steps might be to request them not only to pay the balance of their original pledge with a pledge to contribute an additional amount based on the contributions announced at the pledging conference should one be held, or as a last resort to pay as large a proportion as possible of the outstanding balance in order to help bring down the United States percentage to the lowest possible level. While this would evidently be a less satisfactory solution, and would mean that we would be asked to make an additional contribution, together with the United States and Australia even though the United Kingdom were not prepared to do so, the problem of UNKRA is a serious and urgent one.

In view of the effects of the failure of United Nations economic assistance in Korea, Canadian contribution in this case should be governed more by political considerations than by strictly economic and financial criteria which normally obtain.

For this reason it would be most helpful if some flexibility could be given in the Cabinet authorization with respect to a Canadian contribution.

FUTURE OF UNKRA

The discussion of tactics on the UNKRA item during the Ninth Session was resumed yesterday as scheduled. The Australians were invited to participate this time in the discussion in addition to the Agent General and to the United Kingdom and United States representatives.

2. It was more or less agreed that the decision whether or not there should be a pledging conference should be postponed, until we know the results of the proposed informal meeting of the Commonwealth and European countries. There was general agreement that as in the case of the 60 nations pledging conference it was unlikely that the conference of European and Commonwealth countries would achieve substantial progress unless the four major contributors came to the meeting with something to show. It was felt that if the four countries merely told the other participants of their past contributions and simply asked each nation to indicate what it was ready to do, the meeting might very well have little if any results.

3. At this point, the United States' representatives (Graham Hall and William Hall) announced their intention of suggesting to their government that the balance of the United States appropriation for this year, i.e., 8.4 million dollars should be paid here and now without awaiting as per usual previous contributions by other countries to be matched. The United States representatives were anxious to know what would be the likely reactions of the other main participants in the event that this proposal would actually be accepted by the United States administration.

4. The United Kingdom representative (Arthur Clough) indicated that he was ready to recommend that the United Kingdom pay its balance of 5.5 million dollars if Hall's suggestion was approved in Washington. He indicated however that he was not optimistic that his government would accept his recommendation.

5. The Australian representative (Mr. Cutts) said that he was ready to recommend to his government that Australia make a contribution over and above its pledge if Hall's suggestion was accepted and if this in turn was matched by a modification of the present United Kingdom stand and by an additional Canadian contribution. After having spoken to Sir Percy Spender, Mr. Cutts expressed the view that his government might well decide to do nothing more than to pay the balance of its pledge.

6. The Canadian side expressed its readiness to recommend to you that consideration be given to an additional contribution provided the other three major contributors made positive gestures along the lines indicated above. We, at the same time indicated that it was most unlikely that Canada would make an additional contribution if two of the other main contributors, i.e., Australia and the United Kingdom, refused to make contributions over and above their pledges.

7. It was agreed that the Australian, Canadian and United Kingdom representatives would inform their governments of the possibility of an additional United States payment and ascertain their reaction to the recommendations which each side undertook to make in the light of Hall's recommendation to his government. It was hoped that the reaction of the four governments would enable each of them to come at the forthcoming informal meeting with something new, although it seemed to be taken for granted that the most the United Kingdom Government would do would be to offer the payment of the balance of its pledge. In any event, the decisions taken by the four governments would first be presented to the European and Commonwealth countries as promises to be implemented if these governments did their share.

8. It was generally recognized at one point during the meeting that should the concern of those present at the meeting over the political repercussions of UNKRA failure be shared by their respective governments, the ideal step to be taken in the very near future should be an informal discussion between the foreign ministers of the four major contributors or better still of the foreign ministers of Commonwealth and European countries. Graham Hall confided to one of us during the meeting that he would personally suggest that Dulles take the initiative in this matter. It occurs to us that the forthcoming meeting of the NATO Council in Paris would provide a convenient opportunity to raise this question with European countries. Should this opportunity be taken, Commonwealth Ambassadors in Paris might be brought in these discussions. We should appreciate receiving your comments on the various proposals outlined above as soon as possible.

FUTURE OF UNKRA

While we are keeping the Minister fully informed of the New York discussions and while we fully appreciate the importance of maintaining a flexible approach, we think that our position at the official level can and should be quite firmly stated during any further informal talks between the United States, United Kingdom, Australian and Canadian representatives. Our position is that a possible further contribution by Canada is dependent on additional contributions being made available by the two other main contributors. From your telegram it now appears that while the United Kingdom position remains unchanged the Australian position has weakened to some extent. This situation suggests to us the importance of our maintaining a firm stand in these discussions and not to leave any impression that we would be prepared to recommend an additional Canadian contribution before knowing at least what minimum "positive gestures" the other three major contributors are prepared to make.

2. For your private information, it should be mentioned that Cabinet did not take a decision at its meeting yesterday regarding possible Canadian contributions to extra-budgetary programmes. However we understand this general question will be considered again shortly by Cabinet. In the meantime you will appreciate that we cannot authorize you to say at this time what Canada might do on the basis of the present limited and tentative statements by United States, United Kingdom and Australian representatives.

FUTURE OF UNKRA

Clough of the United Kingdom yesterday showed us a letter from London incorporating his latest instructions on UNKRA.

2. According to the Foreign Office, it is unrealistic to think of possible further contributions of the magnitude of $50 million to $100 million. The problem to be faced is what sort of end can be made of UNKRA with, at best, only $10 million to $20 million in additional contributions or, at the worse, nothing at all.

3. Notwithstanding the above, the Foreign Office considers that "every penny will be of some help" and that the Advisory Committee should continue to seek for contributions. In this connection, London would prefer diplomatic approaches to a pledging conference. The Foreign Office agreed with Clough that these approaches would be more effective if the four largest contributors were able to demonstrate their own generosity by further contributions. London was therefore reluctant to return a wholly negative answer to Clough's suggestion that the United Kingdom pay its balance of 5.5 million dollars, should the balance of the United States appropriation for this year ($8.6 million dollars) be made available.

4. If the United States does give a further 8.6 million dollars, for a total contribution of 93.9 million dollars, the United Kingdom will now be prepared to give 2.52 million dollars, thus increasing its total contribution to 24.75 million dollars. This additional 2.52 million dollars would maintain the desired ratio of 65:17.5 between the United States and United Kingdom contributions; the amount would therefore be considered as an advance to match the contributions of other countries, which should finally represent 17.5 percent of the total. It should be made clear that the United Kingdom would only contribute again when the contributions of all other nations have reached a point where the 65:17.5 ratio attracted a matching contribution from the United Kingdom (i.e., when the member countries other than the United States had contributed an additional $5,000,000.)

5. The Foreign Office considers that before the end of the present session the General Assembly should recommend that UNKRA has now reached "the term of its useful life". The relevant resolution should therefore be designed to bring about the winding up of UNKRA's work and should call for generous contributions from all members, without specifying any revised target.

6. We have been informed by the Australian delegation that Canberra is now prepared to pay the balance of the Australian contribution in full and that the amount of 1.2 million dollars has been included in the budget for this purpose. (Actually, the balance of the Australian contribution is about 1.5 million dollars. The remaining $300,000 will be made available next year.) The present Australian position is that they are not considering any contribution over and above their pledge unless such a move is warranted by extra contributions, not only from Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States, but also from other countries.

7. With reference to my telegram No. 301 of October 21,[†] Coulter told me last week, that, when in Paris, Dulles had spoken about UNKRA to Eden who undertook to look into the matter. The letter which Clough showed us yesterday did not say whether, in fact, Eden had taken any action.

8. The United States delegation have not yet had any reaction to their proposal to Washington that the balance of the United States appropriation for this year should be released.

9. We should appreciate your comments on the points raised in this telegram about the United Kingdom and Australian positions. We are holding a meeting of the UNKRA Advisory Committee at noon on Thursday and it would be most helpful to receive them before that time.

FUTURE OF UNKRA

You will have noted from our telegram No. 233 of November 4 that Cabinet's decision regarding a Canadian contribution to UNKRA for 1954-55 is based on the United States proposal for a reduced programme of $44.9 million which would include an amount of $3 million in the form of additional contributions (over and above original pledges) by the United Kingdom, Australia and Canada.

2. We know that Australia is now prepared to contribute in full the balance of its pledge and that they would be willing to consider an additional contribution if other countries, including the major contributors, would also make the extra contributions. The Australian position therefore seems to be slightly more generous than you were able to report earlier. However, the United Kingdom position continues to be rather disappointing since it seems certain that their contribution will fall short of their pledge unless the United States is prepared to contribute more than the $8.6 million appropriated for this year. Under these circumstances we think that the most you should do during further informal discussions with the three other major contributors is to indicate that the Canadian Government would be prepared to seek parliamentary approval for a further contribution of $750,000 if proportionate additional contributions were forthcoming from the other countries concerned. We would not wish to go any further than this in view of the fact that the final position of the United States is not yet known. Nor would it be advisable to make any public statements in a forum wider than the four principal contributors at this stage.

2. We would welcome any suggestions that you might have regarding the line we should now take with other major contributors in the light of Cabinet's decision.

3. The substance of the foregoing was communicated to you on the telephone prior to yesterday's (November 3) meeting and we should welcome a report as soon as possible on the discussion.

FUTURE OF UNKRA

We discussed UNKRA informally yesterday afternoon with Clough of the United Kingdom, Graham Hall, and William Hall of the United States, Cutts of Australia, and General Coulter. William Hall said that the United States is now prepared to make available the $8.6 million representing the balance of the amount appropriated by Congress for this year, provided that the United Kingdom pays its balance of $5.5 million and Australia its balance of $1.5 million and that Canada makes an additional contribution.

2. Clough reviewed the United Kingdom position as outlined in paragraphs 2 and 3 of our telegram No. 407, i.e., that if the United States gives its $8.6 million, the United Kingdom will be prepared to give an additional $2.5 million. Further contributions would only be made when contributions of countries other than the United States total $5 million.

3. Cutts confirmed what we reported in paragraph 6 of our telegram No. 407, i.e., that Canberra is now prepared to pay the $1.5 million representing the balance of the Australian contribution.

4. As we had not received your telegram No. 233 of November 4, we indicated that we were in no position to make a firm statement about a possible additional Canadian contribution. We made it clear, however, that it was most unlikely that Canada would make one unless Australia and the United Kingdom were prepared to make contributions over and above their pledges.

5. Coulter said that Van Kleffens had told him that the Netherlands had decided to double its pledge (from $500 thousand to $1 million), that Pakistan has pledged $450 thousand, and that Indonesia has promised 300 tons of raw rubber.

6. Clough then said, that, whatever happened, the United Kingdom would not be able to pay any more than its pledge. He added that the Foreign Office feel the United States and the United Kingdom cannot continue to make up the bulk of the shortage in UNKRA funds and that the future financing of UNKRA should be the responsibility of a much wider group.

7. Graham Hall said that in view of the positions taken by the United Kingdom, Australia and Canada the United States would not be able to make its $8.6 million available; as indicated above, the release of that amount was conditional on donations by the United Kingdom of $5.6 million, by Australia of $1.5 million, and by Canada of an additional contribution.

8. There was some discussion about the necessity for an early meeting of either the fifteen countries with troops in Korea or, alternatively, a group of Western European and Commonwealth countries. (Our telegram No. 196 of October 11).† We reiterated our preference for the latter alternative. No firm decision was taken, since the United States representatives wanted to give some further thought to this question. It was generally agreed that at the forthcoming meeting a very frank statement of UNKRA financial plight should be made. Clough suggested that Coulter might be prepared to answer questions about what UNKRA's position will be if

- (a) No further contributions are forthcoming; or
- (b) Contributions of the magnitude of $10 to $20 million become available; or
- (c) The unlikely event that contributions up to $100 million will be made.

FUTURE OF UNKRA

Yesterday afternoon Mr. Mayer of the United States Embassy called on Mr. Rae in United Nations Division and gave an oral explanation of the latest United States position concerning payment of the balance of their current appropriation for UNKRA. Shortly thereafter we received the attached telegram (No. 483)† from our Delegation to the General Assembly which confirms the information given to us by Mr. Mayer.

You will recall that, in accordance with earlier U.S. proposals, the United States was prepared to pay the balance of their UNKRA appropriation for this year ($8.6 million) provided (a) that outstanding balances of pledges by the United Kingdom ($5.5 million,) Australia (1.5 million) and other countries ($1.6 million) were paid in full and (b) that the United Kingdom, Australia and Canada made additional pledges totalling approximately $3 million. While Australia has agreed to pay in full the balance of its original pledge, the United Kingdom has up till now steadfastly refused to pay more than $2.52 million of their $5.5 million balance — and then only on condition that the United States pays a further $8.6 million. (This attitude has been motivated by a desire to maintain a ratio of 65:17 1/2 between the United States and U.K. contributions).

During recent informal talks between representatives of the four major contributors, we have been powerless to make any offer which might end this situation of stalemate since Cabinet's approval of an additional Canadian contribution of

In an attempt to break the stalemate the United States is now making a modified proposal, i.e., to pay their $8.6 million balance in full provided the United Kingdom will give $4.3 million, Australia $1.3 million and Canada $500,000. Australia having already indicated its willingness to pay in full its balance of $1.5 million, the United States is urgently soliciting U.K. and Canadian agreement to their latest proposal.

Mr. Dulles has already made a direct appeal to Mr. Eden in an attempt to secure the necessary modification of the U.K. position (Mayer told us that Eden had reacted sympathetically when this matter was broached earlier in Paris). In order to add weight to Dulles' appeal, the State Department is hoping that we would consider it appropriate to authorize our High Commissioner in London to stress to the Foreign Office the importance we attach to a further U.K. contribution.

Considering that we have paid in full our pledge of $7.25 million, I think we would be quite justified in urging the U.K. to do likewise, bearing in mind of course that they have already paid three times the amount of our contribution or, to put it another way, over 18% of total contributions received by UNKRA to date. We could strengthen our case by saying that the Canadian Government is willing to seek parliamentary approval for an additional contribution of $750,000 if the U.K. and Australia would be prepared to make proportionate additional contributions over and above their original pledges. We could also stress the importance of the four major contributors entering the proposed meeting of Commonwealth and Western European countries in New York with a united front and a reasonably good bargaining position.

If the United Kingdom refuses to pay the balance of its pledge plus an additional contribution, but does agree to pay the $4.3 million portion of its balance as proposed by the U.S., the question then arises as to whether we would be prepared to make an additional contribution of $500,000. In this connection we should perhaps take into account the possibility that other countries may increase their contributions. It has already been reported privately by the Agent General of UNKRA that the Netherlands has decided to double its pledge from $500,000 to $1 million and that Pakistan has pledged $450,000; other increased or new pledges may be forthcoming.

The four major contributing countries are all aware of the serious political implications of an announcement, at the present session of the General Assembly, that the U.N. effort to rehabilitate South Korea has failed for the lack of adequate financial support. The best that can be hoped for is a good showing of "last-round" contributions which would enable UNKRA to carry on its programme for at least another year, if not eighteen months, and to liquidate itself in a gradual and orderly manner.

In our opinion UNKRA's financial plight is sufficiently serious to warrant a further contribution by Canada, at least on the scale now suggested by the United States. This view is shared by our Delegation to the General Assembly (see paragraph 4 of the attached telegram). However, we think it is essential first, and as a matter of urgency to secure the largest possible final contribution from the United Kingdom. In the light of these considerations, I would ask you the following:

(a) Would you agree to instructing our High Commissioner in London to call on the Foreign Office and stress the importance we attach to payment by the U.K. of the full balance of its pledge to UNKRA; the High Commissioner could also say that if the U.K. and Australia would also make some additional contribution beyond their respective pledges, Canada would be ready to contribute an additional proportionate amount not exceeding $750,000.²⁸

(b) If the final U.K. offer is less than the balance of their pledge (automatically eliminating an additional contribution), but at the same time meets the $4.3 million requirement of the United States, would you consider asking the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance whether they would agree to our making an additional contribution of $500,000 (or even $750,000), which would enable immediate and final agreement to be reached between the four major contributing countries.²⁹

Should you agree with (a) above, you may wish to approve the attached draft telegram to our High Commissioner in London.

FUTURE OF UNKRA

1. With reference to paragraph 5 of the above-quoted telegram I should be grateful if you would call at the Foreign Office at your earliest convenience and inform Eden or his immediate subordinate that we attach the highest importance to payment by the United Kingdom of the full balance of their pledge to UNKRA.

2. In our view there is a real danger that UNKRA's activities in Korea may be brought to an abrupt end as a result of inadequate financial support from interested countries. Rapid collapse of the programme in the near future would almost certainly result in further loss of prestige for the United Nations and could have serious political implications for the Western cause. At this stage we think it both necessary and urgent for countries which have not yet done so to pay in full the balances of their respective pledges. This would at least ensure a gradual and orderly winding up of the UNKRA programme during the next eighteen months.

3. You are authorized to say that if the United Kingdom were to pay in full the $5.5 million balance of their pledge ($28 million) and if they (and the Australians) would also be willing to pay an additional contribution over and above their respective pledges, the Canadian Government would be ready to seek parliamentary approval for an additional Canadian contribution not exceeding $750,000. In this connection you might point out that the payment of an additional contribution by Canada without proportionate additional contributions from the U.K. and Australia would put us in the position of being the only one of the four major contributors to pay more than its pledge.

4. For your private information, if the U.K. can make no better offer than to pay the $4.3 million portion of its balance as required by the latest United States proposals, we might still decide to pay an additional contribution of $500,000 in order to secure immediate and final agreement between the four major contributors. This would enable the four to enter the proposed informal meeting of Commonwealth and European countries in New York with a united front and a reasonably good bargaining position for extracting maximum final contributions from the others.

FUTURE OF UNKRA

We have convened a meeting on UNKRA for tomorrow morning (Friday) at 10 o'clock of representatives at the Head of Delegation level of the fifteen countries with troops in Korea. The R.O.K. has not been invited.

2. The primary purpose of the meeting is to emphasize the seriousness of UNKRA's financial condition. General Coulter will make a statement reviewing, in essence, what he had to say in his report and asking the representatives to impress on other delegations the pressing need for further contributions and prompt payment of existing pledges.

3. The representatives of the United Kingdom, the United States, Australia and ourselves are also prepared to make short statements indicating the importance we attach to a continuation of UNKRA's activities, at least until such time as they can be wound up in an orderly fashion. Unless we hear from you to the contrary, we will say that, because of the seriousness of the situation, the Canadian Government would, under certain conditions, be prepared to seek Parliamentary approval for a contribution to UNKRA in addition to that we have already made.

4. At an informal meeting we had this morning with General Coulter, Graham Hall and Mr. Clough, it was agreed that no reference should be made at this stage to the distinct possibility that, unless the United Kingdom contribution is forthcoming, UNKRA would have to announce the failure of its programme.

5. Graham Hall told us this morning the State Department had heard from London that UNKRA was on the Cabinet agenda earlier this week but had not come under consideration. The Foreign Office will try once again this week to get Cabinet to deal with this matter; if they are unsuccessful, they will attempt to have the ministers concerned give the necessary authorization for payment by the United Kingdom of the $4,300,000 necessary to release the United States contribution.

6. In a following teletype we shall be sending you the text of a draft resolution which is being considered for submission to the second committee. It is not at all improbable that, with matters now moving quickly in that committee, the UNKRA item will come up by the end of next week.

7. We shall keep you informed of developments. If there is time, we should appreciate your comments on what we propose to say at tomorrow's meeting.

FUTURE OF UNKRA

Given below is the text of a draft resolution on UNKRA prepared by the Agent General's Office for consideration by the members of the Advisory Committee. The resolution is, of course, predicated on the assumption that the United Kingdom will authorize release of its contribution of $4.3 million and that the agency will, therefore, be able to wind up its affairs in an orderly fashion.

2. Your comments on the draft resolution will be appreciated. As we indicated in our teletype under reference there is a good possibility that discussion of the UNKRA item in the Second Committee may begin next week.

3. Text Begins:

Recalling its Resolutions 410 (V) of 1 December 1950, 701 (VII) of 11 March 1953, and 725 (VIII) of 7 December 1953,

Taking note of the report of the Agent General on the work of the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency for the period 1 October 1953 to 1 September 1954, and of the comments of the United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea thereon,

Noting with increasing concern that the programs approved by the General Assembly in resolution 725 (VIII) have not been fully implemented because of a lack of contributions,

Recognizing the particular importance to the United Nations of the fulfilment of the organization's program for the relief and rehabilitation of Korea;

1. Commends the Agent General of the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency for the encouraging progress made in the work of assisting the Korean people to rebuild their economy;

2. Endorses the statement of the Secretary-General in his annual report on the work of the organization that a failure to follow up the program of assistance to Korea might be widely interpreted as a sign of basic weakness and might shake faith in the United Nations in those very areas where such faith is of special value;

3. Reaffirms its approval of the programs covering the period from 1 July 1953 to 30 June 1954 and 1 July 1954 to 30 June 1955 and stresses its desire that implementation of these programs should be achieved to the maximum extent possible;

4. Urges all governments to give the financial support necessary to the continuation of the agency's work, whether in the form of prompt payment of existing pledges or in the pledging of new contributions to the program;

5. Expresses appreciation for the valuable and continuing assistance given to the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency by specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations;

6. Requests the Negotiating Committee for Extra-Budgetary Funds appointed pursuant to General-Assembly resolution ____top ____ to undertake negotiations with governments regarding the making of new pledges and the prompt payment of existing pledges to the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency. Text Ends.

FUTURE OF UNKRA

Reference paragraph three of your telegram No. 734 we assume that you made a short and general statement this morning in the meeting of the fifteen along the lines you suggested and with which we concurred.

2. Regarding the draft resolution contained in your telegram No. 736 we think the resolution is, generally speaking, on the right lines but we consider that too much emphasis is laid on the fact that the UNKRA program is speedily losing its momentum through lack of financial support. For this reason we would therefore make the following suggestions:

(i) Preamble; paragraph three — It would be preferable to omit this paragraph or to substitute a positive consideration to the effect that further contributions will be required to enable programmes approved by the General Assembly to be fully implemented.

(ii) Paragraph four — Omit the words “to the United Nations”.

(iii) Operative part; paragraph two — We would strongly urge that this paragraph be omitted altogether since its only effect is to emphasize a fear which it would be quite unwise to admit publicly.

(iv) Paragraph three — We do not think there would be any point in the General Assembly reaffirming its approval of specific programmes which it has already proved impossible to implement due to lack of sufficient funds. It would be preferable in our view merely to express the desirability of carrying out previously approved programmes to the fullest possible extent.

(v) Paragraphs one, four, five and six are acceptable.

3. We would be agreeable to your accepting co-sponsorship of the resolution provided that other co-sponsoring Delegations are prepared to accept amendments to the draft resolution along the lines indicated above.

FUTURE OF UNKRA

13 of the 15 countries with troops in Korea were represented at the meeting this morning of heads of delegations at which UNKRA was discussed. They were United States, United Kingdom, New Zealand, Greece, Netherlands, Thailand, France, Turkey, Belgium, Australia, Luxembourg, Colombia and Canada.

2. After a few opening remarks, I introduced General Coulter who reviewed the financial situation in which UNKRA finds itself. He stated that what has been done so far to rehabilitate Korea is imperilled by the fact that the agency will soon run out of funds and will not be able to fulfil its mission unless substantial additional pledges and contributions are received from governments in the immediate future. He asked the representatives present to make an urgent appeal to their governments to support UNKRA and also to evidence that support during the Second Committee debate.

3. Kyrou of Greece agreed that the situation was serious, not only from the point of view of UNKRA itself, but also because of the political implications. He referred to the statement in Committee One on December 1 by Mr. Malik who attacked UNCURK and UNKRA (Malik claimed that the American and United Nations programmes of assistance for South Korea have failed and compared these efforts with what was being done by the USSR and China for North Korea.)

4. Wadsworth of the United States then made a strong statement supporting Coulter and Kyrou. He said that the United States administration is convinced that nothing less than a major, immediate response from governments involving significant contributions to UNKRA will avoid an immediate and drastic curtailment of the programme. He added that the United States is prepared to contribute "a major sum" in addition to that which it has already contributed.

5. Nutting of the United Kingdom expressed full support of the previous speakers. He was not yet in a position to say what the United Kingdom could do with regard to a further contribution. However, he said that if the United Nations does not do something about UNKRA it would be playing into the hands of the Communists. Spender (Australia) and Munro (New Zealand) also spoke along the same lines. The French representative said that he realized that his country's contribution had not been as important as those of other countries but this was because of France's heavy burden in Indo-China, earlier because of the war and now because of the refugee problem. Despite this he would send a telegram to his government urging immediate consideration of the possibility of further contribution to UNKRA. The other representatives indicated that they would do the same. The Colombian and Thai representatives said flatly that it would be most difficult to get any further pledge from their countries.

6. I made a short statement about what Canada would be prepared to do, along the lines outlined in paragraph 3 of our teletype No. 734 of December 2.

7. The question of future action was then discussed and Spender suggested that a pledging conference might be called in three or four weeks to dramatize the situation and rally financial support behind the agency. Nutting thought that a pledging conference should not be held unless it had been ascertained that it would be successful; otherwise it would simply advertise the failure of the agency's programme.

Urrutia of Colombia said that it was most improbable that UNKRA could get contributions from any of the Latin American countries, particularly in view of the results of the Rio Conference; for that reason it might be unwise to consider a pledging conference. I suggested that perhaps a better alternative might be to seek additional funds through the Negotiating Committee for extra-budgetary funds, even though in the past this procedure had not been notoriously successful.

8. It was generally agreed that tactics for handling the UNKRA item in the Second Committee and later for seeking funds should be discussed in the small group (United Kingdom, United States, Australia and ourselves) which has up to now been principally occupied with UNKRA. We are planning a meeting with this group next Monday afternoon and should appreciate your comments before then on the draft resolution sent up to you in our teletype No. 736 of December 2. We should also like to know whether you have any objection to our co-sponsoring the resolution. In view of our close connection with this matter, I think it would be difficult not to do so.

4. KOREAN REHABILITATION

United Nations Division: On December 11 the Second Committee adopted by a vote of 38 to 5 a resolution commending the Agent-General of UNKRA and urging all Governments to give the necessary financial support to enable the Agency's programme to continue. Before the Agent-General's report came up for discussion in the Committee, informal agreement was reached between the United States, United Kingdom, Australian and Canadian Delegations that their respective statements in the Committee would avoid over-emphasis of the financial difficulties of UNKRA and concentrate more on the Agency's positive achievements in rehabilitating Korea. It was also agreed that the United States Delegate would mention in his statement that the four major contributing countries were considering a further contribution of $14.8 million to the Agency to enable it to carry on its work. Announcement of a specific pledge by each country would be deferred until an approach had been made by the Negotiating Committee after this session of the General Assembly.

The figure of $14.8 million to be contributed by the four countries was finally arrived at after lengthy negotiations which were complicated by the fact that the United Kingdom Government was unwilling to pay the full balance of its original pledge of $28 million. Agreement was finally reached on the basis of a formula proposed by the United States Government whereby the United States would make available the balance of their UNKRA appropriation for this year ($8.6 million) if the United Kingdom would pay $4.3 million ($2.2 million less than their pledge),

Australia $1.5 million (the full balance of their pledge) and Canada $500,000 (additional to our original pledge). (RESTRICTED)

INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE NINTH SESSION OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE UNITED NATIONS

The ninth session of the General Assembly is not expected to result in relaxation of major international tensions. None of the items on the agenda offers hope for significant rapprochement between the free nations and the communist world. Most of the contentious items on the agenda have been debated previously. The outcome of the Geneva Conference provides little scope for constructive action on a political settlement for Korea, and the decisions of the Conference on Indochina are not expected to come directly before the Assembly. Some new items, such as Cyprus and West New Guinea, raise grave problems for the countries of the free world, and lend themselves to communist exploitation.

2. Since the end of the eighth session, the communist alliance has achieved a number of diplomatic triumphs outside the United Nations. Its members in the United Nations undoubtedly will seek to pose as protagonists of peace, and to exploit and derive propaganda dividends from differences between non-communist countries which will be aired on a number of issues at the ninth session. In accordance with past practice, the Canadian Delegation¹, therefore, should use its influence to mediate and conciliate disputes involving the non-communist countries in the interests of a united front for the free world. On the other hand, the Delegation should not support any initiative which would deprive the communist members of their rights under the Charter or which, without some important compensatory advantage, would provoke them to leave the Organization.

Elections

3. The Canadian Delegation should support Dr. Van Kleffens of the Netherlands for the Presidency of the General Assembly. In the Security Council elections, it should support Belgium to replace Denmark, and any candidate agreed upon by the Latin American bloc to replace Colombia. Canada's choice for the third vacancy on the Security Council, which results from the retirement of Lebanon, will not be made until further information on candidates becomes available. In the elections for the Economic and Social Council, the Canadian Delegation should vote for France for re-election, the Netherlands to replace Belgium, the choices of the Latin American bloc to replace Argentina and Cuba, and probably Burma and Egypt (a retiring member). The Canadian Delegation should vote for Dr. Pal of India in the by-election for the seat in the International Court of Justice left vacant through the death of Sir Benegal Rau, and the candidates nominated by the Canadian National Group in the general elections. The Group nominated Sir Zafrulla Khan, if he decides to contest the election, Professor H. Lauterpacht of the United Kingdom, Mr. J. Basdevant of France and Mr. C. de Visscher of Belgium.

¹ Le 18 août 1954, le Cabinet approuve les nominations suivantes à la délégation canadienne :

David M. Johnson	délégué
Sénateur Charles B. Howard	délégué
G.D. Weaver	délégué
Lucien Cardin, député	délégué suppléant
M ^{me} K.G. Montgomery	délégué suppléante
S.D. Hemsley	délégué suppléant

On August 18, 1954, Cabinet approved the following appointments to the Canadian Delegation:

L.B. Pearson	Head
David M. Johnson	Delegate
Senator Charles B. Howard	Delegate
G.D. Weaver	Delegate
Lucien Cardin, M.P.	Alternate Delegate
Mrs. K.G. Montgomery	Alternate Delegate
S.D. Hemsley	Alternate Delegate

Le Cabinet convient également que Paul Martin fasse fonction de chef de la délégation en l'absence de Pearson.

Cabinet also agreed that Paul Martin would serve as Head of the Delegation in Pearson's absence.

Korea

4. A joint report will be submitted to the General Assembly by the fifteen nations which participated in the Geneva Conference. The Canadian Delegation should seek to have the Assembly simply note the report and leave consideration of Korean unification to a more propitious time. The Assembly might also re-affirm the Armistice Agreement and re-state United Nations objectives in Korea. If the question of the future of UNCURK arises, the Delegation should seek to have the Commission continue its activities without substantial change, pending new developments in Korea. The Assembly may be reminded that UNKRA, which was established to promote relief and rehabilitation in Korea, is suffering from a serious shortage of funds and a new appeal for increased financial support may be made.

Representation of Communist China in the United Nations

5. In view of the failure of efforts to reach a final peace settlement in Korea in accordance with the principles laid down by the United Nations, the Canadian Delegation should continue at the ninth session to support measures to postpone consideration of the question of Chinese representation for a limited period. In the unlikely event that a vote is in prospect on the substantive question, the Canadian Delegation should refer the matter back to Cabinet.

Admission of New Members

6. It is understood that the Committee of Good Offices appointed by the General Assembly at the eighth session to investigate the possibilities of breaking the deadlock on the admission of new members will be unable to report any progress to the ninth session. The Canadian Delegation should support any measures which may be made to implement a suggestion by the Secretary-General in his latest Annual Report that progress might be made by considering individually applications of countries "which do not directly enter into the balance between the conflicting camps". The Canadian Delegation also should support an Australian proposal to seat Laos and Cambodia in view of the favourable references to their future independence made at Geneva in the settlement on Indochina. It should examine carefully any new "package deal" proposals which may emerge but should refuse to consider any proposals involving the applications of the North Korean and Viet-Minh States in view of plans for the eventual unification of Korea and the Viet-Minh-Viet Nam States.

Cyprus

7. Consideration of the future of Cyprus has been requested by the Government of Greece, which complains that the Government of the United Kingdom has refused to agree to bilateral discussions. The Government of the United Kingdom has indicated it will invoke Article 2(7) of the Charter concerning domestic jurisdiction in an attempt to prevent discussion. The past policy of the Canadian Government on similar questions has been to favour the right of the Assembly to discuss the issue but has been opposed to resolutions that clearly impinge on the domestic jurisdiction of states and involve intervention. While consistently upholding the right of the Assembly to discuss questions involving Article 2(7), Canadian Delegations occasionally in the past have recognized the desirability of avoiding or postponing discussions on political grounds. The attitude of the Canadian Delegation on the Cyprus question should be aimed at minimizing embarrassment to the free world, and views of the Canadian Delegation on the usefulness of the Assembly's discussing the question should be determined in the light of circumstances prevailing at the time and after further consultation with other friendly delegations.

Tunisia and Morocco

8. At its seventh session, the General Assembly adopted two resolutions in connection with Tunisia and Morocco. The Tunisian resolution urged France to continue negotiations with Tunisian leaders to develop increased measures of self-government in Tunisia. The Moroccan resolution was similar but referred to the development of "free political institutions" rather than self-government. As negotiations have continued in regard to Tunisia and since the French Government recently offered important concessions there, the Canadian Delegation should use its influence to discourage renewed intervention by the Assembly. Corresponding developments have not taken place in Morocco, however, and the Delegation, in accordance with past practice, should not attempt to prevent discussion of the Moroccan problem.

The Question of Dutch New Guinea (West New Guinea)

9. This item has been proposed by the Government of Indonesia to bring pressure on the Government of the Netherlands to resume negotiations on the question of the future of the western half of the island of New Guinea. Discussions which began in connection with negotiations between Dutch and Indonesian authorities on the transfer of sovereignty in the Netherlands East Indies have reached a stalemate and the Dutch have shown unwillingness to negotiate further. The Dutch wish to retain West New Guinea for strategic and economic reasons. The issue has political significance in Indonesia and is being pressed by the Indonesian Government to soothe the nationalist bitterness. It has been suggested that the problem might be solved by the establishment of a long-term Dutch trusteeship — a solution that would have advantages for the parties directly concerned as well as for interested third parties. The Canadian Delegation probably should not oppose inclusion of the item on the agenda providing the Indonesian proposal is limited to a request to the Dutch to resume bilateral negotiations, since new discussions have a reasonable prospect of achieving a solution. The Delegation should not define its attitude definitely, however, until further information becomes available on the plans of the Netherlands and other friendly governments for dealing with the question.

South Africa (Items on Race Conflict and Treatment of People of Indian Origin)

10. The Canadian Delegation should continue to support the right of the Assembly to discuss these questions but should abstain on resolutions constituting intervention in domestic affairs of South Africa.

Disarmament

11. A substantial improvement in the position of the West on disarmament has resulted from the private conversations which took place in London during May and June 1954. Canada should participate in Western efforts to capitalize on this development during the ninth session on the assumption that the Western Powers will present a united front on the main aspects of the disarmament programme. In any event the Canadian delegation should support the continuation of the Disarmament Commission which is the proper forum for a detailed examination of the Anglo-French proposals on a comprehensive disarmament programme (and the United States working paper on international control) submitted in London, which has yet to take place. The General Assembly will most probably be asked to express its opinion on the Indian proposals for a "standstill agreement" on hydrogen bomb tests. The Canadian delegation should support any reasonable position taken in this matter by the United States and the United Kingdom, which are more immediately concerned.

Economic Questions

12. Proposals to establish a special United Nations Fund for Economic Development (SUNFED) and an International Finance Corporation (IFC) will again be discussed. While recognizing the needs of under-developed countries, the Delegation should adhere to the previously expressed Canadian view that it is inadvisable to set up the Fund or the Corporation until circumstances, including progress in disarmament, are such that developed countries can contribute on a worthwhile scale. Canada would not be prepared to contribute at the present time. The Delegation should, however, support action to keep alive both the SUNFED and the IFC projects until a more propitious time.

13. A separate memorandum will be submitted on technical assistance matters, with recommendations for the Canadian contribution to the Expanded Programme for 1955.²

14. The Canadian position on the international flow of private capital is that the most important steps toward creating a favourable climate for investment must be taken by the under-developed countries desiring to attract capital.

Human Rights and Social Questions

15. The Draft Covenants on Human Rights have been finally completed by the Commission on Human Rights, and unless a special conference is convened to consider them, this session of the General Assembly may possibly be our last opportunity to influence their content. The Delegation should repeat earlier Canadian suggestions on the drafting of the Covenants, insofar as these have not been incorporated in the final draft, and in particular should press for the inclusion of an acceptable federal-state clause. If the present Soviet-sponsored clause, which requires unlimited application of the Covenants by federal states, is retained, it may be impossible for Canada to sign the Covenants. The Delegation should therefore be careful not to commit Canada to signing the Covenants.

16. The Delegation may support in principle the proposals of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees that the Negotiating Committee for Extra-Budgetary Funds should assume the responsibility of raising funds for emergency aid to the refugees under his mandate and that a five-year programme of integration and resettlement of refugees should be undertaken. No commitment can be made, however, for a Canadian contribution to the High Commissioner's Fund at this time.

17. On the various lesser items relating to human rights and freedoms and social problems, the Delegation should endeavour to have the United Nations and its subsidiary bodies undertake projects which are realistic in terms of prevailing world conditions and in which there is a possibility of practical results.

Questions of Dependent Territories

18. In trusteeship matters, it has been the Canadian view that the details of the administration of trust territories should be left to the Trusteeship Council and the General Assembly should concern itself with broad principles. The Delegation should maintain this attitude. It should also seek to moderate the inevitable disagreements between those countries that administer trust territories or colonies and those that do not and are critical of the administering powers.

19. The United Kingdom proposal to end its trusteeship of British Togoland and unite this territory with the Gold Coast appears to warrant Canadian support. Although there is no prospect of South Africa accepting any form of accounting for South West Africa to the United Nations, the Delegation should support the procedure which has been worked out by the Ad Hoc Committee on South West Africa in an effort to implement the International Court's opinion on the status of the territory.

Personnel Questions

20. The International Court has ruled that the General Assembly has no right to reject the awards of compensation made by the United Nations Administrative Tribunal to dismissed United States nationals. The United States may continue to oppose payment of the awards, but the Canadian Delegation should vote to uphold the opinion of the International Court.

UNITED NATIONS GENERAL ASSEMBLY; 9TH SESSION; INSTRUCTIONS FOR CANADIAN DELEGATION

24. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the 9th session of the General Assembly was not expected to result in relaxation of major international tensions. None of the items on the agenda offered hope for a significant rapprochement between the free nations and the communist world. Most of the contentious items on the agenda had been debated previously. The outcome of the Geneva Conference provided little scope for constructive action on a political settlement for Korea, and the decisions of the Conference on Indochina were not expected to come directly before the Assembly. Some new items, such as Cyprus and West New Guinea, raised grave problems for the countries of the free world, and lent themselves to communist exploitation.

Since the end of the 8th session, the communist alliance had achieved a number of diplomatic triumphs outside the United Nations. Its members in the United Nations undoubtedly would seek to pose as protagonists of peace, and to exploit and derive propaganda dividends from differences between non-communist countries which would be aired on a number of issues at the coming session. He felt that, in accordance with past practice, the Canadian delegation should, therefore, use its influence to mediate and conciliate disputes involving the non-communist countries in the interests of a united front for the free world. On the other hand, the delegation should not support any initiative which would deprive the communist members of their rights under the Charter or which, without some important compensatory advantage, would provoke them to leave the Organization.

Draft instructions to the Canadian delegation on such matters as elections, Korea, representation of Communist China in the United Nations, admission of new members, Cyprus, Tunisia and Morocco, Dutch New Guinea, South Africa, disarmament, economic questions, human rights and social questions, dependent territories and personnel problems in the United Nations secretariat, were submitted for consideration.

Some of these items presented rather difficult problems. For example, it was suggested that the Canadian delegation be instructed that, in the event the substantive question of whether Communist China should be admitted to United Nations came to a vote, the matter should be referred back to Cabinet for consideration. This was merely a device to avoid the necessity of taking an immediate decision on a question of importance on which United Kingdom and United States views were sharply divided.

It was also feared that the question of Cyprus might give rise to a difficult situation. Consideration of the future of Cyprus had been requested by the Greek government who had complained that the United Kingdom had refused to take part in bilateral discussions. The U.K. government had indicated it would invoke Article 2(7) of the Charter, concerning domestic jurisdiction, in an attempt to prevent discussion and that, in the event the question actually did come up for discussion, the U.K. delegation would walk out. The past policy of the Canadian government on similar questions had been to favour the right of the Assembly to discuss the issue, but had been opposed to resolutions which clearly impinged on the domestic jurisdiction of states and involved intervention. At the same time, Canadian delegations, occasionally, in the past, had recognized the desirability of avoiding or postponing discussions on purely political grounds. He felt that the attitude of the Canadian delegation on the Cyprus question should be aimed at minimizing embarrassment to the free world, and views of the Canadian delegation on the usefulness of the Assembly discussing the question should be determined in the light of circumstances prevailing at the time and after consultation with other friendly delegations.

In the event the question came to a vote, the Canadian delegation might abstain without taking a positive stand one way or the other.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, Sept. 7, 1954 — Cab. Doc. 187-54).

25. In the course of discussion the following points emerged:

(a) It was suggested that the Canadian delegation should be extremely careful in handling the Cyprus question. Of the total population on the island, approximately 80 percent were of Greek origin, 18 percent of Turkish origin and 2 percent of other origin. The Greek government contended that what it wanted was to enable the local population to determine by free vote, whether it wished to remain under British jurisdiction or to go to some other jurisdiction, or to have independent government. On the other hand, the U.K. government felt that the Greek government as an ally had been extremely ill advised in raising this issue at the present time in view of the recent withdrawal of British forces from the Suez Canal zone and the continuing need of Cyprus as a U.K. military base in the eastern Mediterranean.

(b) Problems arose more and more frequently in the United Nations which demonstrated the apparent conflict between that Article of the Charter which removed domestic matters from U.N. jurisdiction and another Article which stipulated that any matters came within U.N. jurisdiction if they affected peace and security. It was suggested that the Canadian delegation might consider the advisability of suggesting that this question be referred to the Secretariat for full consideration and report.

(c) With regard to proposals to establish a special United Nations Fund for Economic Development (S.U.N.F.E.D.) and an International Finance Corporation (I.F.C.), it was noted that, while Canada was not prepared to contribute at present, the delegation should support action to keep alive both the S.U.N.F.E.D. and the I.F.C. projects until the time might be propitious to implement them. Some doubt was expressed as to the advisability of having the Canadian delegation give support to these projects on the basis proposed.

26. The Cabinet approved the draft instructions to the Canadian delegation to the 9th session of the United Nations General Assembly, as submitted by the Secretary of State for External Affairs; it being understood that the stand to be taken by the Canadian delegation on proposals to establish a special United Nations Fund for Economic Development and an International Finance Corporation would be considered further by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Finance.

NINTH GENERAL ASSEMBLY PREVIEW: POLITICAL ITEMS

It may be of some assistance to you if I try to put together in this letter some estimate of the probable character of the Ninth General Assembly on which we have been reporting piecemeal, item by item.

2. I think most Western Delegations here would now agree that the Ninth Session will have its quota of headaches, but is unlikely to be of the same order of importance as, for example, the Seventh Session when an outline of the Korean armistice was evolved. Unless some unforeseen development takes place, there is unlikely to be any one theme of predominating importance to Canada throughout the Ninth Session. For a variety of reasons of which the most important is perhaps the unresolved question of the representation of Communist China, the major political questions — certainly those dealing with Far Eastern affairs — cannot really be negotiated in the United Nations at present; the pattern of negotiating outside the United Nations has been set at Berlin and Geneva.

3. The time was when a Canadian Delegation could begin an Assembly in the hope that concrete accomplishments would be achieved, and if there is no such optimism this year we can at least hope that the world will be in a no more unhappy state at the end of our labours than when we began.

4. This may sound cynical. It is not. It is the general impression among Permanent Delegations that the United Nations is going through a critical phase. It is for the time being no longer fulfilling its primary function as a place where major differences are settled, or where the attempt to settle them is at least made. Differences are now aired, not settled. The United States Representative compares the odd shape of the General Assembly to a megaphone, and uses it accordingly, following the pattern long established by Soviet Delegates.

5. Nor can the smaller Delegations be absolved from all blame for the situation in which the United Nations finds itself. A number of the Latin American Delegations and most of the Arab and Asian Delegations have gradually been using the United Nations more and more as a kind of "wailing wall". The General Assembly gives them a unique opportunity every year to attack the colonial powers for the slow pace at which non-self-governing and trust territories are being brought to self-government. At the same time they insistently hold out their hands for some kind of capital as well as technical assistance in the economic development of their territories, calling for help in most cases upon the very countries they have been assailing as retrograde imperialists.

6. The fact is, of course, that the United Nations as at present constituted is not a suitable place for conducting serious negotiations. It is literally and metaphorically a glass house set in the news capital of the world. Our experience last year showed that even such a subject as disarmament — a United Nations subject par excellence — could not be profitably handled in New York among all members of the Disarmament Commission meeting in public. It was dealt with by means of a private sub-committee of the five powers principally concerned meeting in London. This is a pattern which may have to be followed in dealing with other subjects which have not only a propaganda but a substantive value.

7. If no convenient tag is yet evident for the Ninth Session, it is nevertheless apparent that colonial questions will feature prominently on the agenda of the Political Committee. We shall have to grapple as best we can with the legal and political nettles surrounding the questions of Cyprus, West New Guinea, Tunisia and Morocco. The Canadian Delegation may have to face a re-examination of our views of former years on the interpretation to be given to intervention in domestic affairs of states and the precise meaning of Article 2(7) of the Charter. For although we could with reasonable confidence assert that Assembly discussion of apartheid in South Africa and even of the restless evolution of French North Africa was permissible, the attempt by Greece to detach from the United Kingdom a territory to which the United Kingdom Government has clear title raises the prospect of anti-colonial agitation in the United Nations on a scale never contemplated at San Francisco. Indeed, it is becoming increasingly clear that if the drift in this direction is not checked by an upsurge of robust commonsense, the colonial powers will come to regard the United Nations as a liability, reacting in a manner detrimental to the high aims and purposes of the United Nations — and to their own national interests as members in good standing of the international community.

8. While the colonial issues will unquestionably be the most important for the Western European powers, the question of Chinese representation will again dominate the scene for the United States and colour its approach to every other question and every election. Although United States leaders of both parties have permitted themselves to speak in less rigid terms about this issue in recent weeks, I think that their moderation is based on the assumption that, as Sir Winston Churchill evidently suggested in Washington earlier in the summer, the admission of Communist China to the United Nations should not be considered until there is peace in Korea. This would give the United States further cause for contentment with the status quo in Korea were they not relieved of responsibility for that deadlock by the joint intransigence of the Communists and President Rhee.

9. In keeping with their equivocal attitude towards the Geneva Conference and the settlement reached on Indo China, the United States Delegation will in all probability try to head off any General Assembly resolution calling for the resumption of negotiations with the Communists on Korea or the convening of a Geneva Conference on Korea. Their attitude may be in direct conflict with that of the Indian Delegation. Judging from some of the recent discussions in Washington on the report of the 16, the United Kingdom, Canadian and other Commonwealth Delegations may find themselves in an awkward position.

10. Indo China offers the Soviet Delegation similar possibilities for divisive and rather fruitless debate. Although the representations of the United Kingdom, French and Canadian Governments have been successful in dissuading Prince Wan from proceeding with his item on the threat to the security of Thailand, the Australians, with little or no prior consultation have submitted an item on the admission of Laos and Cambodia which will, it is feared, open a debate on Indo China, even though the damage may be minimized by discussing the subject as part of the general question of the admission of new members.

11. In any case, it seems altogether likely that the annual Soviet omnibus item on "measures to avert the threat of a new world war and to strengthen peace and security among nations" will be resuscitated in an effort to drive the obvious propaganda wedges between the Western Powers on both Korea and Indo China for the benefit of Communist propaganda in Asia and in Western Europe.

12. We do not yet know whether the United States Delegation will come up with any new move in the cold war. They have been considering the inclusion of an item which would aim at spotlighting Soviet imperialism in Eastern Europe and elsewhere, to off-set the effect of the items which will put the United Kingdom, the Netherlands and France "in the dock". Although an item dealing with self-determination in Eastern Europe must clearly be classed as a "cold war item" there does seem to be a grave injustice in the pattern which has been developed in recent years of, so to speak, "picking on the good boys". The Soviet Government has rarely been attacked, and never directly by the Arab and Asian group which have made the deliberate calculation that only the colonial territories of the Western Powers could conceivably be detached by the intervention of the United Nations.

13. We are also in doubt as to how the United States Delegation will treat the proposed Agency for the peaceful development of atomic energy which was announced on Labour Day by President Eisenhower. His omission of any reference to the United Nations in his announcement has been quietly regretted by United Nations commentators who recall that the President told the General Assembly last December 8 that the United States expected that "such an Agency would be set up under the aegis of the United Nations". When the President's plan was first laid before the General Assembly it was greeted with remarkable enthusiasm and the failure to follow through with an Agency in some way related to the United Nations, even without the participation of the Soviet Union, would be not only a disappointment but, in our opinion, a missed opportunity.

14. If the United States has decided not to feature its plans for an atomic agency related to the United Nations, the disarmament debate will in all probability be dominated by three proposals:

(a) the Anglo-French memorandum submitted during the Sub-Committee talks in London;

(b) the Soviet proposal to ban the use of the atomic bomb; and

(c) the Indian proposal to stop all further thermonuclear test explosions.

15. Both the Soviet and the Indian proposals may cause the Western Powers some embarrassment. For this reason, if for no other, Western tactics will probably feature the Anglo-French proposals which have so far failed to receive the attention from the press and the public which they undoubtedly merit.

16. Any review of the Assembly's agenda which passes over the economic, social, administrative, financial, legal and trusteeship problems is obviously incomplete. I have tried however to concentrate on the political problems which will be receiving the most public attention and which will therefore largely determine the character of the Assembly.

17. Finally, there is one question, namely Chinese representation, which is not on the agenda but will colour and influence every election and every political question to be discussed.

18. The United Kingdom Government now seem willing to agree to a procedural motion to postpone this issue once more for the rest of the year, by which time the United States Mission hope that the Ninth General Assembly will be over. The only Western Europeans who will probably not support postponement are the Scandinavian Delegations. With the support of the Latin American Delegations assured, there seems no doubt that the postponement motion will carry. The issue which was raised in such dramatic terms in Washington in July is therefore largely unreal insofar as the forthcoming session is concerned. But looking further ahead the United Kingdom, France and other Delegations foresee that it might become a very real issue at the Tenth Session next year (which is not an election year in the United States), provided there has been no new outbreak of violence in the Far East or elsewhere in the meantime.

19. Until this issue is solved the United Nations cannot hope to function as it was intended that it should. With the possible exception of such neutrals as Finland and Austria, no headway towards universality of membership can be expected until it is solved, nor can the Great Powers do other than by-pass the United Nations in any negotiations that must involve Communist China.

20. It may interest you to know that when I asked Mr. Hammarskjöld how he thought the Ninth General Assembly would develop he replied that it was impossible for anyone to make predictions with any degree of certainty until they knew Mr. Dulles' mood and Mr. Vyshinsky's instructions.

STATUS OF CYPRUS

Since April of this year we have been pressed by the Greek Government to use our influence to persuade the United Kingdom Government to agree to hold "friendly talks" with Greece about Cyprus. The Greeks have stated that unless bilateral negotiations took place, they would be obliged to make an appeal to the United Nations — presumably a plea that the Cypriots be permitted to express their views on the future status of the island. The Greeks confidently believe that the majority of Cypriots would in any official plebiscite vote for union with Greece. We have made clear to the Greek representatives our desire not to become involved in the dispute and have deplored the prospect of a debate at the United Nations which can benefit only the communists. (The history of the Cyprus question is attached as Appendix A† and a summary of the Canadian attitude on the domestic jurisdiction clause of the Charter, as Appendix B.†)

2. It is clear from recent informal discussions with United Kingdom officials that we shall shortly be faced with a formal request from the United Kingdom Government for support in their effort to block the inscription of the Cyprus question on the Assembly agenda. If we are agreed that for political and practical reasons we should support the United Kingdom in this attempt, we can no doubt devise a formula to reconcile such a position with our past performance at the United Nations on the question of competence and particularly in its relevance to colonial questions. The reconciliation lies, however, in a practical rather than a legal approach to the problem.

3. The Greek Delegation at New York has now requested that the Cyprus issue be placed on the provisional agenda of the forthcoming Assembly. We have also been informed by the United Kingdom that they will strenuously oppose the inscription of the item on the agenda. The United Kingdom Government has informed the Department that, if the United Kingdom failed to block the placing of the item on the agenda, its representatives would absent themselves from the debate on the subject. It seems that in such event the United Kingdom Government would also reconsider its policy of cooperation with the United Nations on colonial matters. The United Kingdom authorities take a very serious view of the jurisdictional question, implicit in the Cyprus issue, and believe that if the Assembly is permitted to debate this issue, there can be no limit to its investigation of colonial and other domestic matters. Other United Kingdom officials have said that the Cyprus issue at the United Nations will be regarded as a test friendship. The United Kingdom would like the full support of its NATO and Commonwealth partners. A recent report stated that the United Kingdom, France and the Netherlands had agreed to support each other in an effort to keep all colonial issues off the Assembly agenda. While this pooling of resources would not seem particularly helpful to the United Kingdom case, it does help us to assess the probable voting at the Assembly.

4. The United States has exerted strong pressure on the Greek Government to persuade it to withhold action at the Assembly. The Papagos regime, although professing reluctance to stir up this potential hornets' nest of embarrassment for the Western democracies, is unwilling for reasons of domestic politics to be restrained. It seems likely, moreover, that the Greek authorities strongly resent the curt rebuff by the United Kingdom of their suggestion about bilateral negotiations. Because of public opinion in Greece about Cyprus, the Greek Government may require a face-saving device. The Greeks appear confident that they can win wide support at the United Nations.

5. Much will depend on the attitude of the United States and Turkey. The United Kingdom authorities believe that the United States will give them support at the United Nations but there has been no United States commitment to vote against the inclusion of the Cyprus question on the agenda. Although United States officials are sympathetic to the United Kingdom position, domestic opposition to colonialism and irritation about the United Kingdom policy on other matters might oblige the United States Government to withhold full support. However, there has been a hint of a horse-trade between the United Kingdom and the United States involving the admission of Communist China. The United States will no doubt be influenced too by the attitude of Turkey. There seems little doubt that the United States will, in any event, do its utmost to moderate the debate. For their part, the Greeks appear to be counting heavily on United States support.

6. The attitude of Turkey is now clear. The Turkish Delegation will vote against the inscription of the Cyprus item on the agenda and, if it is inscribed, will continue to oppose discussion at the Assembly. Turkish officials have in the past expressed strongly their opposition to any change in the status quo. They apparently do not relish the prospect of Greece acquiring sovereignty in Cyprus. Apart from their own aspirations, the Turks are concerned about the Turkish minority which forms about 18 percent of the population of Cyprus. The Turks have not aired these views too openly, because of their close relations with Greece and particularly because of recent developments toward a Balkan alliance.

7. The United Kingdom stand-fast policy is based primarily on an appraisal of the strategic value of Cyprus. For the foreseeable future the United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff consider that the island must remain under United Kingdom sovereignty. The United Kingdom officials recognize that this argument would attract little support. Their first line of defence will be the domestic jurisdiction clause (article 2(7) of the Charter), on which a strong legal argument can be made. As further arguments against debating the question at the United Nations, United Kingdom may urge practical reasons such as the futility of a sterile debate, the need for stability in the area, the material advantages to the Cypriots of United Kingdom occupation, the recent decision to establish limited self-government. However, because of the emotional appeal of the Cypriot demand for self-determination, because of the inflexibility of the United Kingdom stand-fast policy and because of the past trend at the United Nations in favour of a full discussion of colonial issues, the United Kingdom arguments may well not succeed in preventing inclusion of the item on the agenda.

8. United Kingdom officials are apparently aware that our past liberal attitude on the domestic jurisdiction clause might create difficulties for us. They obviously hope we can find some formula for giving them full support. We have given them our reasons for believing that the majority in the Assembly will decide in favour of a debate on Cyprus. We have expressed our grave concern about their proposal not to participate in the debate — which action, we believe, will only aggravate the embarrassment which the debate will cause the Western democracies. They seem aware of these possibilities but not unduly worried about them.

9. The United Kingdom Government is no doubt under heavy pressure to maintain its position in Cyprus. It has to bear in mind not only the roused public opinion in the United Kingdom but the attitude of loyal Cypriots. United Kingdom officials believe that any suggestion of bilateral negotiations with Greece would be interpreted in Cyprus as a sign of weakness and the beginning of a withdrawal from the island. Thus the administration would be undermined. Nevertheless, although this exercise of power politics may be unavoidable, the achievement of its principal aim — a stable location for key military establishments in the chain of command and communications — seems unlikely because of the methods being employed. The recent announcement that anti-sedition laws would be rigidly enforced to prevent the campaign for union with Greece is perhaps the forerunner of increasingly stringent measures to maintain order on the island. The recent decision to establish a constitution patterned on but not as liberal as the one rejected in 1948 seems unrealistic. Many sections of the United Kingdom press have begun to deplore these tactics, though sympathizing with the Government's desire to maintain sovereignty.

10. Whatever the merits of the case we shall have to do what we can to minimize the damage at the United Nations. The Soviet Union and its sympathizers will no doubt seize the opportunity to embarrass the United Kingdom and its NATO allies, to woo the opponents of colonialism in Asia and Africa, and to exploit the rifts in NATO solidarity which the debate will open. The United Kingdom, whose record at the United Nations is reasonably clean, may also be assailed by anti-colonial operators from Asia, Africa and Latin America. Perhaps the heaviest loser, however, will be the United Nations which will have one more burden which might more appropriately be borne by the parties concerned.

11. The courses open to us are as follows:

(a) We can work with the United Kingdom to prevent the Cyprus item from being inscribed on the agenda. Since Canada is not likely to be represented on the General Committee, we shall not be required to take a stand on the procedural question, until it is raised in plenary session. In this event we could vote against inscription and explain our vote in practical rather than legal terms. We could argue, for example, that the proposed discussion was untimely and unlikely to yield beneficial results.³ In consultation with the United Kingdom, which would have to be made aware that our view was based more on the "untimeliness" than on the "impropriety" of the Greek appeal, we might also use our influence to canvass support for the movement to block the item. If these efforts failed and if the United Kingdom appeared to welcome our doing so, we might work to moderate the debate and head off troublesome resolutions. The foregoing course of action would please the United Kingdom but not the Greeks, who might nonetheless understand our position in the matter.

(b) We could vote for the inscription of the item on the agenda and work for a moderate resolution,⁴ calling upon the parties concerned (perhaps to include Turkey) to enter into negotiations or perhaps merely taking note of the situation. This action would be most unpopular with the United Kingdom (which has not often requested that we lend support on colonial matters) and, in view of the latter's inflexible attitude, would be unlikely to yield beneficial results for the United Nations or for the Cypriots. It would certainly encourage extreme Greek nationalists to intensify their campaign for Pan-Hellenism which has wider implications than Cyprus.

(c) Like the Turks, we could vote against the inscription of the item on the agenda and, if the effort to block it failed, continue to oppose the discussion of the question. This approach appears to be what the United Kingdom would like us to do but in view of our attitude on earlier colonial questions like Tunisia and Morocco, might be hard to justify, in spite of genuine distinctions which can be made. Moreover, we would then be precluded from taking action to moderate the debate and the resolutions and from advocating the United Kingdom's case.

(d) We could hold aloof from the debate and abstain in all voting. While this action might be consistent with a neutral attitude on colonial questions, it would not be consistent with our general desire to be helpful at the United Nations and might be misunderstood in many quarters.

(e) We could take no part in the procedural debate and abstain on the vote whether the item should be inscribed on the agenda. We could explain our abstention as being a balancing of our past attitude on domestic jurisdiction with our belief that no practical benefits would result from the debate. If a debate were proceeded with (which we believe is all too probable) we could work to moderate the discussion and any resolutions which might come out of it. We might counter communist propaganda by pointing to the benefits which the Cypriots have derived from United Kingdom administration. We would oppose immoderate resolutions and might also try to persuade the United Kingdom not to stage a "walk-out".

11. There seems to be no need at the moment to take a decision on these courses of action. Indeed, it may be desirable to hold off until the policy and tactics of the United States and other friendly governments become more fully known. Shortly, however, we shall have to tell the United Kingdom, and presumably the Greeks, what position we propose to adopt at the Assembly.

12. I see few advantages and some difficulties in courses (c) and (d). If you agree, we might discard them now and continue to study the implications of the other three, in consultation with friendly governments.⁵ Your views on this approach would be appreciated.

CYPRUS

The Belgian Ambassador called on Mr. Chapdelaine yesterday to discuss this subject. Mr. Muûls had been instructed to ask for our views on a suggestion of Mr. Spaak that each one of the NATO powers should make separate representations to Greece and to the United Kingdom with a view to persuading them to take some action to avoid the threatened debate between NATO partners on Cyprus at the ninth session of the General Assembly. Although the Belgian Ambassador did not say so, we assume that the démarche would be designed to persuade the two parties to enter into bilateral talks. The Belgian Government would like to have our reaction to Mr. Spaak's proposal, if possible, by Friday.

2. At an early stage we considered in the Department whether the Cyprus question might be introduced for discussion by the NATO Council. We concluded that although the Council might be an appropriate forum for such discussion, in view of the inflexible attitude on both sides there appeared to be little possibility that that course of action would alleviate the situation and it might, moreover, have graver consequences for NATO than a debate at the United Nations, without satisfying the demands of the Greeks or improving the lot of the Cypriots. We also concluded that any action within NATO and any Canadian initiative in this regard would be bitterly resented by the United Kingdom, although it might be welcomed by Greece. We believe that similar considerations apply to Mr. Spaak's suggestion.

3. The Greek Government would be only too happy to comply with any démarche along the lines of Mr. Spaak's suggestion, subject to its being accepted by the United Kingdom. There would probably be no difficulty about withdrawing the item from the Assembly agenda. In his most recent despatch on Cyprus (No. 423 of September 1)† Mr. MacDermot has reported his impression that Greek officials, notably Mr. Kyrou, are anxious about the consequences of the decision to precipitate the issue at the United Nations. The Greeks have been amply warned by friendly governments about the harm which is likely to result. They are fearful too because hopes in Greece may have been raised too high and because of the possible repercussions of a Greek failure at the Assembly. In effect the Greeks are clinging to their argument that the Papagos Government was obliged by the pressure of popular indignation to take action at the United Nations. Of equal value as a face-saving device, without the attending disadvantages would be an opportunity to discuss the Cyprus issue bilaterally with the United Kingdom.

⁵ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

4. For its part the United Kingdom considers that the status of Cyprus is a domestic matter and one not open for discussion by third parties. The United Kingdom's standfast policy is designed to win friends among the Cypriots, more of whom are believed by the United Kingdom authorities to be favourably disposed to the present rule than would appear on the surface. The United Kingdom officials are relying heavily on the loyal Cypriots to make greater efforts to combat the extremists of the right and the left who have been pressing for union with Greece. These reasons, among others, have much to do with the United Kingdom's refusal to listen to any suggestions about discussions concerning the future status of the island. The United Kingdom officials apparently believe — perhaps as a result of the bitter experience in Iran and Egypt — that talks of any kind will be interpreted by all the Cypriots as the beginning of the end — the forerunner of a withdrawal from Cyprus. The extreme Greek nationalists would be thereby encouraged to intensify their activities; the loyal elements would be completely disheartened; and the undecided Cypriot majority would have no real choice to consider. The United Kingdom Government hopes that its policy of firmness will work in the opposite direction (and incidentally will calm the roused rebels of the Conservative Party). They hope too that, combined with the material benefits of United Kingdom occupation and the most recent constitutional reforms, the standfast policy will turn the tide against Enosis.

5. While we may not share the United Kingdom's optimism about its present policies on Cyprus and while we may deplore the tactics employed, we should only be asking for trouble if, knowing as we do the motives behind United Kingdom policy, we were to press the United Kingdom Government to take steps which it has already carefully considered and found unacceptable. Unless Mr. Spaak has some information from United Kingdom sources which indicate a softening of attitude, we can see no likelihood that an approach by NATO powers, either jointly or separately, can do anything but aggravate the situation by incurring the annoyance of the United Kingdom. This irritation might greatly add to the present difficulties within NATO. As you know, we tried earlier to find some room for manoeuvre in the United Kingdom position but our approach in London met with a rather blunt rebuff. The United Kingdom is obviously hoping, among other things, that this adamant attitude will persuade others to support its effort to block the inscription of the item on the Assembly agenda. In any event, it seems, the United Kingdom Government has firmly decided to do nothing which can be remotely regarded as weakness on Cyprus. The conclusions are, therefore, that Mr. Spaak's suggestion has come too late and that even if it had come earlier, it would have been doomed to fail.

6. Accordingly, if you agree, I might speak to the Belgian Ambassador along the following lines: our present information indicates that there is no hope of avoiding the unpleasant situation which threatens at the forthcoming Assembly. We greatly deplore the prospect and have, in fact, made informal efforts to dissuade the parties from pursuing the policies which have led to the item being placed on the agenda. Our understanding is that the United Kingdom has no intention of changing its stand on Cyprus. If the Belgian Government has any reason to believe that this is not so, we shall be glad to reconsider the question of an approach by the several NATO powers. As presently advised, however, we regret we can see no benefit and perhaps some harm, particularly to NATO, in Mr. Spaak's suggestion.⁶

Following your comments on my memorandum of August 20, the Department has continued to examine the courses of action which appear to be open to Canada when the Cyprus item comes up for discussion at the ninth session of the General Assembly. We have been concentrating on the inscription issue, that is, whether the item should be inscribed on the agenda. Recent reports from London and New York have given a clearer, though not much brighter, picture of the prospects at the forthcoming Assembly.

2. The discussion is likely to develop along three main lines, the first two of which may become intertwined:

(a) The Inscription Issue—The General Committee will discuss whether the item should be inscribed and make its recommendation to the plenary session, which in all probability, since the issue will be closely contested, will re-examine the question.

(b) The Competence Issue—If the Assembly decides that the item should be inscribed on the agenda, the question will then have to be decided whether the Assembly is competent to discuss the merits.

⁶ Note marginale :/Marginale note:
I agree L.B. P[earson]

(c) The Merits—If the Assembly decides that it is competent to discuss it, the Cyprus issue will probably be presented by the Greeks as a plea that the Cypriots be allowed to express their views on the future status of the island — in short, to exercise the right of self-determination said to be embodied in Article 1(2) of the Charter.

3. These lines of development can and should be considered separately in deciding the policy and tactics which the Canadian Delegation to the ninth session should adopt. The inscription issue is obviously the most important, because if it is decided against Greece the other issues will not arise, at the forthcoming Assembly at least, and the United Nations and the Western democracies will have been saved from a most unpleasant situation. The inscription issue should be decided primarily in the light of the harm which is likely to stem from a United Nations debate on Cyprus. It is now clear that this debate will have no beneficial results for anyone but the communists. Our aim is, therefore, to find a formula which will enable us to work for the prevention of that harm.

4. It should be emphasized that the inscription issue has not often been raised concretely at the Assembly. Most delegations have in the past been content to allow all items to be inscribed on the agenda — although there have been occasions when delegations have been persuaded to withdraw items or when items have been postponed for future sessions. Those opposed to the discussion of any specific item have usually waited until the debate in plenary session or in the relevant committee to urge the well-known arguments on the competence issue, that is, whether the Assembly has the right under the Charter to discuss the matter before it. Past Canadian policy, which in a general sense has been liberal toward the Assembly's right to discuss, has usually been related to the competence issue rather than the inscription issue. You will recall that the Assembly has decided (in 1952 when your ruling on Rule 80 was overruled) that the competence issue should not be argued until a decision has been taken on whether the item concerned has been inscribed on the agenda.

5. The most recent reports indicate that the United Kingdom will approach the Cyprus item somewhat along the foregoing lines. The United Kingdom authorities now say that, although they must of necessity and for the record emphasize their legal objections to the inscription of the Cyprus item on the agenda, it is not their intention to base the United Kingdom case on inscription exclusively on legal considerations. They do not wish to turn the debate on inscription into a series of arid, legal dissertations when the subject matter of the Cyprus issue is so important for the maintenance of good relations between Greece and the United Kingdom, for the stability of the Balkan alliance, for the continued progress of the people of Cyprus and for the continuance of the work of the United Nations in relation to non-self-governing territories. In the debate on inscription in plenary session, at which stage the Canadian point of view is likely to be expressed, the United Kingdom Delegation propose, after a passing reference to the legal position, to appeal to members, whatever their views on the legal issues, to recognize that the discussion of the Cyprus issue in the General Assembly would be most unpropitious at present.

6. The United Kingdom officials have admitted that this change of tactics is designed to win support. They hope that their approach will make it possible for member states, like Canada, who have in the past regarded "discussion" as being something less than the "intervention" contemplated in Article 2(7), to lend their support to the United Kingdom effort to block inscription.

7. The most recent tabulation of the anticipated vote on the inscription issue reveals that the United Kingdom is having some success in persuading member governments to their point of view:

(a) The following countries have signified their intention to vote against inscription: Australia, Belgium, France, Liberia, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Peru, South Africa and Turkey. (We now understand that Pakistan will also vote against inscription.)

(b) The following countries have replied to the United Kingdom representations in such a way as to suggest that they will abstain: Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Denmark, Iceland, India, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Mexico, Norway, El Salvador, Sweden, Syria, United States and Yugoslavia.

(c) None of the countries approached has definitely stated its intention to vote for inscription but the responses of Afghanistan, Burma, Guatemala, Egypt and Indonesia, indicate that they are more likely to vote with Greece than to abstain. The Soviet bloc was not approached but it is regarded as certain to favour inscription.

(d) Some twenty countries, including more than half the Latin American states, are as yet unaccounted for. There is no indication that either the Latin American or the Arab states will vote en bloc.

(e) The United Kingdom attaches great importance to being able to change some of the abstentions in (b) into votes against inscription. They may be successful in the case of Chile, Colombia and Iraq and possibly El Salvador.

8. The United Kingdom has been informed that the United States will abstain on the question of inscription. We assume that this abstention will be on the general ground that it is not expedient to discuss the Cyprus question at the forthcoming Assembly. Whether the United States is prepared to use its influence with other governments to assist the United Kingdom is not clear. We are expecting a report from Washington on United States policy and tactics.

9. Interesting reports from New Delhi and Karachi indicate that neither the Indians nor the Pakistanis have much enthusiasm for the Greek appeal to the United Nations and both are anxious to avoid any embarrassment to the United Kingdom. They apparently regard the Cyprus question not so much as a colonial issue as a dispute about a piece of territory between two European powers. The Indians have explained that their previous attitude toward the domestic jurisdiction clause makes it difficult for them to oppose the inscription of the Cyprus item; they will probably abstain on this procedural issue. The Pakistanis have expressed the same difficulty but have apparently found a formula which will permit them to oppose inscription. The attitude of these two powers may influence other states in the Arab-Asian bloc, although most of the latter may not care whether the United Kingdom is embarrassed.

10. The foregoing assessment, largely based on information from United Kingdom sources, indicates that the voting on the inscription issue will be close. Previously we had concluded that there was little chance that the United Kingdom opposition to inscription would gain much support. Now, it seems, the United Kingdom authorities are cautiously optimistic about the outcome of the inscription vote. In these circumstances, the Canadian vote might assume considerable importance. It will be wise, therefore, to withhold our final decision on the voting, until the line-up has become more clearly established.

11. In the meantime I suggest that we give serious consideration to the following recommendations:

(a) Canadian policy on the inscription issue must take into account our past liberal attitude toward the Assembly's right to discuss many matters not unlike the Cyprus issue and the political and practical question whether a discussion of Cyprus in the Assembly at this time would exacerbate rather than improve matters. If we were to be guided solely by our past practice we should probably not oppose inscription of the Cyprus item. However, on political and practical grounds, there is a strong case for opposing discussion of the issue by the Assembly at the present time. On balance abstention seems to be the best course for Canada to adopt on the inscription issue. However, if it becomes apparent that the Canadian vote may well be decisive on whether the item is to be inscribed — and the present indications are that there will be a close vote — we should be prepared to consider a vote against the inscription of the item. Like New Zealand, we could confine our explanation of the vote to political and practical arguments why the Assembly should not discuss the Cyprus issue now, without specifically denying its competence to discuss the matter.

(b) If the item is inscribed on the agenda and the competence issue continues to be contested, we should abstain on the competence issue and explain our abstention on the grounds that we have in the past usually voted in favour of the Assembly's right to discuss, that we have serious doubts whether this right extends to the Cyprus item and that, as we would have previously said on the inscription issue, we have grave misgivings about the wisdom of an Assembly discussion.

(c) If, notwithstanding the foregoing, the merits of the Cyprus issue are debated, we shall have to consider carefully the course to be adopted. As a matter of tactics we might work to have the matter referred to one of the non-political committees. We have until now considered that in any such debate Canada would try to moderate the discussion and to head off troublesome resolutions. Our High Commissioner in London has recently reported, however, that the United Kingdom would probably prefer a harsh resolution to a moderate one, because the former could more easily be ignored. This attitude creates a complicated situation which we may well have to play by ear as the matter develops.

12. If you agree, this memorandum might serve as the basis of the policy guidance section of the commentary note.

GENERAL COMMITTEE—CYPRUS

By a decisive majority, the General Committee this morning recommended the inscription of Cyprus on the assembly's agenda. The vote makes it a foregone conclusion that the issue will be inscribed. Nine countries voted in favour (Burma, China, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Ecuador, Iceland, Syria, Thailand, USSR), three were against (Australia, France, United Kingdom), and there were three abstentions (Colombia, the Netherlands, United States).

2. The motion to postpone consideration of the Cyprus question at this time, which might have squeezed through the General Committee yesterday afternoon, was abandoned and never presented this morning because the Greeks, as soon as they realized they had a majority behind them, naturally refused to accept a postponement. The unexpectedly large vote in support of inscription was due to the fact that the Arabs, and probably Iceland and some of the Latins, had instructions to abstain if the vote was going to be close but otherwise to support inscription. Although Van Kleffens abstained in the General Committee as its Chairman, the Netherlands will oppose inscription in plenary.

3. Although both sides of the case were well and forcefully presented, the statement of the United Kingdom's position by Selwyn Lloyd was outstanding. Virtually conceding that the Greeks had a good case on legal grounds, based on the largely accepted interpretation of the Charter, Lloyd treated the inscription issue as "a test of the political wisdom" of the General Assembly, maintaining that the function of the United Nations was to diminish tension not to increase it. He spoke feelingly of Anglo-Greek ties of friendship and, although he touched on the strategic argument, asserted plainly that the goal of the United Kingdom Government for Cyprus was self-government. Without going into specific examples he reminded the General Committee that almost every country has foreign ethnic groups within its frontiers and the inscription of Cyprus would create a precedent which could be used and abused indefinitely with most unsettling effects. It was all very well, he said, to maintain that discussion was not intervention, but in his case the Greeks were plainly asking in their memorandum for United Nations action, not merely discussion.

4. Kyrrou presented the Greek case basing himself on the Charter, on United Kingdom promises in both world wars regarding the future of Cyprus, and on the principle of self-determination of peoples.

Having heard that the Scandinavian and Canadian delegations intended to oppose inscription, the United Kingdom Delegation persuaded Jamali of Iraq to propose, under Rule 76, the adjournment of the Assembly's consideration of the inscription of Cyprus for a few days. Jamali's proposal was strongly opposed by Kyrrou of Greece and was lost on a tie vote (24-24-12) in which the United Kingdom no doubt regretted that they had scrupulously abstained.

2. Lloyd then developed the same arguments he had used in the General Committee, stressing particularly (chiefly for the benefit of the Latins) that the precedent would be dangerous for any country having minority ethnic groups within its territory or whose frontiers had been fixed by treaty agreement, for Greece had accepted the status of Cyprus under the Treaty of Lausanne.

3. Lange of Norway also spoke strongly against inscription for reasons similar to our own.

4. Stephanopoulos then presented the Greek case with less clarity and effect than Kyrrou had achieved in the General Committee. Nevertheless the vote went in his favour 30-19 (Australia, Belgium, Canada, Chile, Colombia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, France, Liberia, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Paraguay, Peru, Sweden, Turkey, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom) with 11 abstentions (Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Ethiopia, India, Iran, Iraq, Pakistan, Panama, United States, Venezuela).

5. In explanation of vote Krishna Menon explained that he would abstain because the question at issue was not really the liberation of a colonial people but the transfer of sovereignty from one power to another.

6. In the light of the vote, Greece cannot claim moral victory although her item has been inscribed. It is unlikely, however, that the postponement which was so nearly achieved would have given the United Kingdom Government time to affect the votes of enough countries to make a difference in the outcome.

1. As Dr. MacKay was informed by telephone, I decided shortly before the plenary session met yesterday to consider the general committee's report on the agenda that, on balance I should vote against the inclusion of the Cyprus item rather than abstain. It was not an easy decision. It was taken on the basis of the assumption that our vote on inscription so far as the Cyprus issue was concerned should be based upon consideration of two main elements:

(a) Our view of the Assembly's competence to consider the Cyprus question having particular regard to Article 2(7);

(b) Our view of the wisdom of a discussion of Cyprus in the United Nations at the present time.

2. With regard to (a) and having in mind our traditional attitude in related matters, I had come to the conclusion that this item could not be opposed on legal grounds of competence. In previous years, however, we had indicated that in matters of inscription our judgment as to the value and effect of a particular decision must be applied as well as purely legal criteria. It was therefore after balancing the considerations in this second category that I came down against the inscription of the Cyprus item.

3. The following factors seemed to me to tip the scales:

(a) The United Kingdom delegation had made an extremely effective case brilliantly presented by Selwyn Lloyd.

(b) They had won the support of all our closest Western friends except the United States and Iceland. A number of other governments including India and Pakistan and five Latin American states which normally would not have opposed inscription on colonial issues shifted their position to one of abstention.

(c) Up to the last moment the voting situation remained so fluid and uncertain and was the subject of such conflicting reports, that it was just possible that our vote might have had some direct influence in the result.

(d) I had warned in the Tunisian debate in 1952 of the danger of putting items on the agenda indiscriminately; Mr. Pearson made the same point with considerable emphasis in his opening statement in the plenary session.

(e) The form and language of the Greek item do not merely call for a general discussion of Cyprus but refer to “application under United Nations auspices of the principle of equal rights and self-determination”. Presumably this would involve action by a United Nations plebiscite, which in our view would most certainly have prejudged the issue and set the Assembly from the outset on the path towards intervention.

4. On balance, therefore, I felt justified, in accordance with the general Cabinet decision on this matter and the specific instructions in the departmental memorandum of September 16, in deciding that on this issue and at this time, a vote against inscription should be cast.

5. In the case of the West New Guinea item on which we abstained in the matter of inscription, there were two main considerations which prompted this stand. In the first place I understand that Mr. Pearson had informed the Indonesian Ambassador in Ottawa that we would not oppose inclusion of this item, and that this position had also been communicated to the Netherlands Government. In the second place, the fact that Indonesia was itself a product of United Nations effort and that organs of the United Nations are still technically seized of aspects of the Indonesian settlement provided a basis for distinguishing this case from the Cyprus issue.

CYPRUS

According to United Kingdom sources the Greek Delegation has been trying to sell a “benign” resolution calling for confidential talks, either between the United Kingdom and Greece or to include them and Turkey, about the future status of Cyprus. The Greeks have approached the Turks on the proposed resolution but the latter have rejected it in either form. The United Kingdom is opposed to any substantive resolution by the Assembly and would regard a “benign” resolution, as proposed by the Greeks, as in some ways worse than the original Greek proposal for a United Nations plebiscite in Cyprus. Such a resolution would tend to obscure the United Kingdom contention that the passing of any resolution by the Assembly, except one to close the debate, would constitute an intervention by the United Nations in the domestic affairs of the United Kingdom and would recognize the standing of Greece as a party to a dispute with the United Kingdom about Cyprus. Moreover, since the Greeks have made it clear that they are prepared to negotiate only on the basis of the United Kingdom’s eventual relinquishment of sovereignty, an Assembly resolution calling for diplomatic talks, far from being a neutral move, would endorse the Greek case. A related United Kingdom objection is that the Greek proposal would have the effect of retaining the item on the agenda for a subsequent session, an outcome which the United Kingdom is anxious to avoid.

2. The United Kingdom has asked for Canadian support to have the Cyprus debate disposed of in a summary manner, that is, to have the Assembly approve a procedural motion not to discuss the item or to close the debate. The objective is to forestall a discussion of the merits and to remove the possibility of a substantive resolution. The United Kingdom hopes by this means to kill the Cyprus item once and for all. The attached copy of a letter from Earncliffe, dated October 12, 1954, contains the request for assistance, although it lacks clarity as to the exact procedure the United Kingdom proposes to adopt. The letter points out that Canada's opposition to the inscription of the Cyprus item has clearly carried great weight in the Assembly and that in the United Kingdom view it would powerfully assist the attempt to get the Cyprus item disposed of summarily, if Canada would find it possible to approach suitable governments for their support. The United Kingdom authorities have suggested Argentina, Brazil, Mexico, Pakistan, Venezuela and Yugoslavia as the most effective countries to be approached. The Norwegian Government was also to be asked to assist in this way, although it is not clear whether the Norwegians were to approach the same group of governments or a different one.

3. The Delegation at New York has been consulted about this United Kingdom request. Mr. Martin has expressed the view that we should do nothing further about Cyprus, at least for the present.⁷ He considers that the question will not be raised again until the end of the session. From his conversations with Mr. Selwyn Lloyd, moreover, Mr. Martin believes that the United Kingdom Government's primary concern at the moment is its political position at home. I find myself largely in agreement with Mr. Martin and I understand that you hold similar views.

4. The following assessment supports the conclusion that a negative reply be given to the United Kingdom request:

(a) The United Kingdom attempt to have the Cyprus item disposed of summarily will probably fail. It is clear that before the vote on the inscription issue the responsible governments represented at the Assembly gave careful consideration to the position which they should adopt. It is unlikely that many would change that position. Even if all the abstentions voted against Greece, a most improbable event, the vote would be a tie. The United Kingdom must hope, therefore, for a weakening among the members which voted in favour of inscription. The United Kingdom could succeed only if the members voting against inscription stood firm and picked up some support from the abstentions and perhaps from among those voting in favour of inscription, or if there were substantial abstentions from among the last mentioned group.

(b) Without active canvassing by the United States in favour of the United Kingdom, the United Kingdom move to dispose of the item stands little chance of success. As is usually the case in close voting at the Assembly, the desired results can be achieved only by obtaining the bulk of the Latin American votes. It is unlikely that Canada or Norway exerts sufficient influence to accomplish this end.

⁷ Note marginale :/Marginal note:
I agree L.B. Pearson

(c) Of the countries we have been asked to approach, we might succeed in persuading Brazil and Pakistan to vote in favour of a motion not to discuss or to close the debate. It is doubtful whether we would persuade any of the others, particularly Yugoslavia which probably has no desire to shake the Balkan Alliance, already weakened by the split between Greece and Turkey.

(d) We must not overlook our relations with Greece. The Canadian Ambassador in Athens has reported that towards the Commonwealth members the Greek attitude on the voting on the inscription issue has been less reproachful than dejected, the disposition being to attribute the stand of the Commonwealth countries to "loyalty to their partner" rather than to pressure and intrigue by the United Kingdom. This absence of hostility is no doubt due in part to the fact that Greece succeeded in having the Cyprus item inscribed on the agenda. If we were to campaign actively in favour of a United Kingdom motion to dispose of the item summarily and regardless of whether the move succeeded, the Greeks might conclude that we had carried our "loyalty" in one partner too far at the expense of loyalties within NATO.

(e) As you know, our decision to vote against inscription of the Cyprus item was reached only after we had carefully weighed the implications of the present Greek appeal against our past attitude toward the Assembly's right to discuss, in particular colonial issues. We concluded that the Greek appeal in its present form implied an intervention in the domestic affairs of the United Kingdom which the Charter clearly prohibits and that, moreover, a debate by the Assembly was likely to do much harm with benefit to none but the communists. Notwithstanding these conclusions, we considered that our vote against inscription represented a marked departure from our earlier attitude toward the Assembly's right to discuss. To canvass actively for a further move to block discussion, after the Assembly has voted to inscribe the item, would be to move too far from our past policy and might be difficult to justify.

5. The arguments in favour of giving additional support to the United Kingdom are also strong:

(a) Consistent with our belief that the present Greek appeal implies an intervention by the Assembly in the domestic affairs of the United Kingdom and that, in any event, the debate will result in nothing but harm, we should be prepared to support any move to eliminate further discussion, particularly discussions of substance.

(b) Already most unfortunate irritation has been generated by the Cyprus discussion. The strained relations between Greece and Turkey have been a source of considerable anxiety in Athens. The reaction in Turkey bodes ill for the Balkan Alliance. The friction between the United Kingdom and Greece has increased. The disappointment in Greece about "uncertain friends", particularly the United States, is not helpful.

(c) According to a report from Mr. MacDermot, under the surface reaction of victory flows an uncertain and unpredictable current of dissension in Greece about the Government's handling of the Cyprus affair. Opposition to the union of Cyprus with Greece exists among a small but important section of the business community and is being reflected at Cabinet level. The conclusion is that although the Cyprus exercise has won recognition at home and abroad for the Papagos Government, it has created difficulties which may be more far-reaching than they appear. These undesirable effects are not likely to be decreased if the Cyprus item is proceeded with. Accordingly, although the Greek Government cannot take the initiative in moving to dispose summarily of the Cyprus item, the Greek authorities might not be too upset if the matter did subside without further repercussions.

6. The balance of argument suggests the following:

(a) Although we need not yet decide, we should be prepared to consider a vote in favour of any United Kingdom motion not to discuss, or to close the debate.⁸

(b) We should, however, inform the United Kingdom, in reply to its request for assistance, that in our view the attempt to have the Cyprus item disposed of summarily will not succeed, with or without our help, that in the light of all the circumstances we can see little advantage in our canvassing for support.⁹ We suggest that our reply should be made informally to Earnscliffe along the lines of the attached draft Aide-Mémoire† which, however, would not be given to them, unless they specifically ask for a written reply. We would at the same time assure the United Kingdom authorities of our desire to help them as much as we can in the debate itself.

(c) We should continue to consult with friendly delegations about the next phase of the Assembly discussion in the hope that some other formula for minimizing the harmful effects of the debate will emerge before the closing days of the session. By that time presumably the United States Government will not be preoccupied with domestic elections and will be in a position to assess its position on Cyprus; we suspect that the Turkish reaction may be causing anxiety in Washington.

7. I shall be glad to know whether you agree with the suggested course of action.¹⁰

CYPRUS

On October 7 Earnscliffe informally left with the Department a memorandum requesting Canadian assistance to organize support for a United Kingdom suggestion "that the (Cyprus) item be disposed of in a summary manner". The United Kingdom objective was stated to be "to avoid any substantive resolution and so far as possible any debate". We assumed that this approach related to the course of action, outlined in sub-para. (a) or para. 2 of your Telegram No. 1258 of October 5† and presented as an alternative to course (b) of the same paragraph.¹¹ The United Kingdom memorandum suggested that we might wish to canvass states, to include Argentina, Brazil, Mexico, Pakistan, Venezuela and Yugoslavia, which had either voted in favour of inscription or abstained. A similar request for assistance was to be made to the Norwegian Government.

2. When we received your Telegram No. 1270 of October 8† stating that the Colonial Office had decided to abandon the attempt to kill the item outright in the early stages of the Political Committee's proceedings, we assumed that the United Kingdom authorities, having decided that course (a) mentioned in your Telegram No. 1258 would be unlikely to succeed, were falling back on the alternative course (b). We believe that ours was a reasonable interpretation of those two telegrams together. We relayed this information informally to Earnscliffe and assumed that we would not be pressed concerning the request for assistance.

3. However, on October 12 Earnscliffe sent us a letter formally requesting our assistance in substantially the same terms as the informal approach of October 7. Until we received your Telegram No. 1293 of October 13 we continued to believe that the United Kingdom authorities were merely slow in making the Colonial

¹¹ Le texte du paragraphe se lit comme suit: The text of the paragraph reads as follows:

(a) If they think there is a fair prospect of killing the Cyprus item outright (i.e. by putting through a motion "not to discuss" or to close debate under Rule 118 before any substantive discussion has taken place), they should work to have it taken early in the committee's agenda in the hope of getting it disposed of within the next two weeks;

(b) If (a) seems unlikely to work, the delegation should seek to have the item placed at the bottom of the agenda, by which stage parliament in London may be less excitable, the assembly may have less time on its hands, and, with the Congressional elections over, active American support will more likely be forthcoming.

Office change of tactics known to the United Kingdom High Commissioner in Ottawa. We had therefore made no reply to the approach from Earnscliffe and are now considering what form it should take.

4. For your own information, even before receiving the Telegram No. 1270 we had tentatively reached the conclusion not to give assistance in the manner suggested. We fully appreciate the concern of the United Kingdom Government about a "benign" resolution and about striking the Cyprus item from the Assembly agenda once and for all. However we considered it extremely unlikely that sufficient support could be mustered for the proposed United Kingdom move, which we understand still to be a motion not to discuss or a motion to close debate to be made at a later stage in the session. Most of the member governments, having given careful consideration to the Cyprus question before taking a stand on the inscription issue, would be unlikely to change their attitude if any new effort were made to eliminate a debate on the subject. Moreover, a canvass by a Commonwealth partner might prove more of a hindrance than a help to the United Kingdom. These negative conclusions were reached notwithstanding our previous position on the inscription issue and the possibility that we might give further support to the United Kingdom if the motion not to discuss or to close debate were voted upon.

5. Accordingly we now find ourselves in the position of having to give a negative reply to Earnscliffe's letter of October 12. We should like to avoid a formal reply. Our present inclination is to express our views informally and as tactfully as possible through Earnscliffe to the United Kingdom authorities, at the same time suggesting that, as the threatened debate draws nearer and in consultation with the United Kingdom and possibly other delegations, we may be able to devise some other formula for minimizing the harm likely to result from the debate.

CYPRUS

On October 18 Lord Swinton informally discussed this matter with Mr. Pearson who pointed out to him that we had gone pretty far in voting against the inclusion of the item on the agenda and that it would be difficult for us to lobby other Delegations as requested. He was told that we appreciated the strength of the United Kingdom case; and the Minister thought we would be able to support the United Kingdom Delegation in the vote on any resolution. The Minister suggested that, in addition, in informal discussions at New York we might be helpful to the United Kingdom in underlining the danger to the United Nations if the Greek contention were accepted.

2. On October 20 we gave the United Kingdom Deputy High Commissioner informally a negative reply to the United Kingdom request that we approach suitable governments to support the United Kingdom efforts to have the Cyprus item disposed of summarily. We advanced the reasons outlined in paragraph 3 of my telegram No. 1583 of October 15 and also stated that for Canada to canvass actively for a further effort to forestall discussion after the General Assembly had decided to place the item on the agenda, would be to move too far from past Canadian policy at the United Nations. We added, however, that our reply should not be taken to mean that we did not share the United Kingdom's desire to see the Cyprus item disposed of quickly and decisively; nor did it mean that we might not participate in some alternative proposal for minimizing the harm likely to result when the item comes before the First Committee.

3. Pritchard expressed some disappointment with our reply and said he had hoped, after our vote against inscription, that we could find it possible to support the United Kingdom in the way requested. We reviewed briefly the difficulties we had faced in reaching the decision on the inscription issue and expressed again our regret that we could not in the circumstances follow up with a formal canvass in favour of the United Kingdom position. Pritchard argued that Swinton had been left with the impression that the Minister did not dismiss completely the idea that we might be helpful in New York in canvassing support. To make the record clear we reiterated to Pritchard what Mr. Pearson had told Swinton.

CYPRUS

On November 26 Mr. J.J.B. Hunt of the Earnscliffe staff left with Mr. Ford a copy of C.R.O. Circular Telegram Y 513 of November 24, 1954 on Cyprus. This telegram confirmed information we had received from the Canadian Delegation in New York that the United Kingdom had abandoned the idea of avoiding the Cyprus issue simply by having it placed low on the agenda of the Political Committee. On November 24 Mr. Nutting emphasized to a meeting of Commonwealth Delegations that the United Kingdom would like the debate on Cyprus to be held at this session, ¹² Note marginale :/Marginal note:

Minister took original [of this memorandum] to New York. G. M[urray]

that a postponement would have an undesirable effect in Cyprus and that the defeat of any resolution proposed by Greece would be the result preferred by the United Kingdom. Accordingly, the United Kingdom has discarded its earlier plan to introduce a motion to postpone the discussion or not to discuss the Cyprus item at all. The United Kingdom aim now is to concentrate on defeating the passing of any resolution whatsoever.

2. The United Kingdom Delegation has been instructed to continue to lobby vigorously against any resolution, making it clear that the United Kingdom Government (a) denies the right of the United Nations to interfere in matters of essential domestic jurisdiction; (b) will not be represented at any discussion of such matters; (c) will ignore any resolution passed; and (d) does not wish its friends to initiate or support any softening of the terms of the original Greek item, because a "benign" resolution might obscure the illegality and undesirability of any United Nations intervention. The United Kingdom authorities are considering what further action is necessary, consistent with the foregoing, to ensure that the United Kingdom case is brought prominently to the attention of other Delegations during the actual debate.

3. In handing us the circular telegram Mr. Hunt had been instructed to ask informally for our support. In accordance with his instructions, he added in confidence that the United States had given the United Kingdom a confidential undertaking that it would actively oppose the passing of any resolution and would do all possible to keep any discussion to an absolute minimum. The United Kingdom Government hopes, according to Mr. Hunt, that Canada will find it possible to do no less than the United States has undertaken to do. The United States attitude is, I think, an important factor we must keep in mind. It would be difficult for us to take a stand that offered less support to the United Kingdom than that of the United States. The United Kingdom authorities would like to know, if possible, our reactions to the policy they have decided to adopt and the position we ourselves might adopt if such a policy were pursued at the General Assembly.

4. The Canadian Delegation has reported that the Greek Delegation are considering a draft resolution which will not recommend negotiations (an earlier "benign" resolution which the Greeks had in mind would have recommended diplomatic discussions by the parties concerned) but will now seek Assembly recognition of the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples as applied, under United Nations auspices, in the case of the population of Cyprus. Not having the exact text it is not easy to assess this Greek proposal. However, if it is made to appear merely as a re-statement of one of the purposes of the United Nations (Article 1(2) of the Charter), placed in the context of the Cyprus issue, the resolution might be difficult to defeat, even by applying the two-thirds majority rule, because some delegations which voted against inscription for reasons not related to the competence issue might find it hard to oppose a draft resolution which was superficially innocuous.

5. No matter how the Greek draft resolution is worded, it will probably be designed as a foundation upon which subsequent applications to the United Nations can be based, if the Greek Government decides to reintroduce the Cyprus item at a future session. However innocuous the resolution may appear on its face, it is assumed that the underlying aim of Greece is to effect, perhaps not at this session but as an ultimate result, a change of sovereignty in respect of Cyprus. During the course of the recent discussions at the United Nations and the lobbying behind the scenes there and in the various capitals concerned, the fundamental aim to change sovereignty through action by the United Nations has emerged as the most significant element in the Cyprus issue and as the factor which tends to distinguish it from all similar issues, such as the questions of Tunisia, Morocco and even West New Guinea. The emotional appeal of the Greek arguments is strong but it should not be permitted to obscure the issue of sovereignty.

6. It is not surprising that the colonial and administering powers, in particular, should resist in the United Nations efforts to advance the notion that one member could bring about a change of sovereignty in the territorial possessions of another merely by raising the principle of self-determination. The objection to that notion is one that all states should weigh carefully. In addition to its inherent dangers, the notion is not supported by any text in the Charter. The Charter defines one of the purposes of the United Nations as the development of friendly relations "based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples"; and provides that the General Assembly shall initiate studies "assisting in the realization of human rights and fundamental freedoms" and that the United Nations, with a view to the creation of conditions of stability which are necessary for friendly relations "based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination" shall promote universal respect for and observance of human rights; but the Charter does not create a right to self-determination which many spokesmen from the anti-colonial countries seem to assume is contained in it.

7. Of particular relevance in this connection are the Charter provisions concerning non-self-governing territories (Article 73-74) and the international trusteeship system (Articles 75 and following). In both cases the administering powers recognize their obligation to develop self-government within the territories concerned. There is no mention of any obligation to grant independence or, in other words, to allow the free exercise of the principle of self-determination. It is true that the anti-colonial powers, in keeping with their view that the General Assembly represents the conscience of mankind, have persistently tried to endow it with powers to free dependent peoples. In the absence of a supplementary international agreement, however, such power cannot be held to exist under the Charter.

8. Notwithstanding their validity, the arguments in the preceding paragraphs are unlikely to attract wide support at the General Assembly. There is no denying the colonial flavour of the Cyprus issue. Like other issues of its kind, the Cyprus question will be assessed not on legal grounds but in accordance with the political aims of the various voting blocs in the General Assembly. The communist countries and the consistently anti-colonial states of Asia, Africa and Latin America can be expected to support the Greek contentions. The usual line-up of votes on colonial issues has, however, been disturbed (a) because of the Commonwealth connection and (b) because of the attitude of Turkey. Although the Turks were late in starting, they have since the inscription of the Cyprus item been lobbying energetically against Greece. They too will oppose any resolution on Cyprus. There is some reason for believing that the Turkish lobbying may have changed the attitude of some of the states which either voted in favour of inscription or abstained on that issue. Another significant factor is the attitude of the United States. It would be interesting to know whether the United Kingdom authorities have correctly interpreted the "confidential undertaking" that the United States will actively oppose the passing of any resolution.¹³ If the United States uses its influence in this way and if the Turks have managed to collect their own supporters, in addition to those of the United Kingdom, there may well be a defeat of any resolution proposed by Greece.

9. It is not easy to foresee what the effect might be of a Greek failure to have a resolution on Cyprus passed at the present session. After the first flush of victory about the vote on the inscription issue the Greeks took a look around at their bedfellows and were somewhat shaken to find none of their NATO partners were present. The strain which the Cyprus issue has placed on the Balkan Alliance has been another cause for concern. On his recent trip to Spain and Portugal, although the opportunities for propaganda were available, Marshal Papagos was very reserved in his comment about Cyprus. The Greek Gover [Approximately four lines of text are missing from the only located copy of this memorandum.] possible, if the United Kingdom would only say that at some time it would be prepared to talk about the status of Cyprus with the Greek Government. If the outcome goes against Greece presumably the Government will be able to say that it tried and failed; that it was defeated by Great Power politics. This will be better than nothing but it may lose Marshal Papagos some prestige, at a time when he is losing supporters owing to a Cabinet shuffle.

Recommendations

10. Unless we decide on general political grounds to support the United Kingdom by opposing whatever resolution the Greeks put forward, we shall probably have to await the text of the draft resolution before making a final decision. If the Greek resolution is to be anything like the one discussed in paragraphs 4 and 5, we shall have to consider carefully whether we should oppose it, if for no other reason than to ensure that no precedent or foundation is provided for subsequent efforts to self-determine territory from one state to another. Having voted against the inscription of the present Greek item, largely for political reasons, I think it would be inconsistent if we did not vote against the substance of the question, when raised in Committee, if we still believe that United Nations approval of the resolution would amount to interference in the internal affairs of Cyprus and would have a deplorable effect on the situation there. In reply to the United Kingdom approach of November 26, I recommend that we tell Earnscliffe that we cannot give a firm commitment at this stage to vote against any Greek resolution but that our present inclination is to do so for the reasons outlined in this memorandum.¹⁴

11. As a procedural matter leading to the final vote, the United Kingdom Delegation may resort to the two-thirds majority rule. In doing so they would have to make the case that the Cyprus item involved important questions for the United Nations. In view of the sovereignty issue and the domestic jurisdiction clause, this should not prove too difficult in theory but if the delegations which supported Greece on inscription stand fast for tactical reasons, the United Kingdom would not succeed. I suggest that the Canadian Delegation could probably support the United Kingdom in a move of that kind, since there are undoubtedly important issues involved.¹⁵

Following is the text of the draft Greek resolution on Cyprus, which Kyrrou handed to me this morning with the remark that it was a resolution "more than moderate to which no one could object".

"The General Assembly,

Having examined the item for the application, under the auspices of the United Nations, of the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples in the case of the population of the Island of Cyprus,

Mindful that one of the purposes of the United Nations, as set forth in Article 1 of the charter, is "to develop friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples",

Recalling that, by Resolution 637 A (VII) of 16 December 1952, it had been recommended that "the states members of the United Nations shall recognize and promote the realization of the right of self-determination of the peoples of non-self-governing and trust territories who are under their administration and shall facilitate the exercise of this right by the people of such territories according to the principles and spirit of the charter of the United Nations in regard to each territory and to the freely expressed wishes of the peoples concerned, the wishes of the people being ascertained through plebiscites or other recognized democratic means, preferably under the auspices of the United Nations",

I expect you will have heard from Earncliffe that, consequent on the tabling of the Greek draft resolution on Cyprus, the United Kingdom authorities on strong American advice, have reconsidered their earlier decision to work for the defeat of any resolution whatever on this item. The Greek resolution is so mildly and seductively worded that officials here have virtually abandoned hope that it can be defeated. Accordingly with the object of preventing it from being put to vote, the United Kingdom delegation in New York has been given discretion to work for one or other of the following alternatives:

- (a) A procedural resolution "not to discuss" the item; or in the last resort
- (b) A move to crowd the item off this year's agenda.

2. Alternative (b) above would appear in effect to mean postponing the item until the next session. The United Kingdom authorities do not like this prospect but if postponement is unavoidable they would prefer to have it on their own terms rather than as part of a Greek resolution containing an unacceptable provision regarding self-determination. It may be significant in this connection that in discussing the advantages of the various possible alternatives, Lodge is reported to have hinted to the United Kingdom delegation in New York that in the event of the item being postponed, the United States would consider the possibility of persuading the Greeks to drop it altogether before the next session. This indication of possible American intentions should be treated cautiously as we are unable to confirm the exact terms in which Lodge spoke.

CYPRUS

You are no doubt somewhat bewildered, as we are, about the many shifts in United Kingdom tactics on the Cyprus item. The most recent United Kingdom decision not to work for the defeat of any resolution whatever but to return to the earlier alternatives (mentioned in Canada House Telegram No. 1494 of December 2) was not passed to us by Earncliffe and as a result we had based our thinking on their request of November 26 for our support. When questioned unofficially about this Pritchard of Earncliffe said they had suppressed C.R.O. Telegram No. 533 because it seemed to contradict so flagrantly their previous stand. We are not quite sure where matters stand at the moment but assume that you will be consulting closely with the United Kingdom Delegation.

2. We are wondering what prompted the United States to advise the United Kingdom to reconsider their decision to work for the defeat of any resolution on the Cyprus item. In our telegram under reference we have stated our views on the Greek draft resolution (your Telegram No. 699 of November 30) which however mildly worded has grave implications for the United Nations. In our view it would have been desirable to defeat the Greek attempt to win recognition for its contentions concerning the self-determination of Cyprus, not only because of the consequences as regards the Cyprus issue but because of the unfortunate precedent which would be established. Moreover, in view of our earlier attitude towards self-determination, as expressed in our vote against resolution 637 A(VII) of December 16, 1952,¹⁶ it would not have been too difficult for us to vote against the present Greek draft.

3. We have never been happy about the United Kingdom proposal to introduce a "motion not to discuss" the item. Procedural niceties apart, we cannot view such a motion as being anything but a second attempt to choke off discussion. For many delegations the voting on the motion not to discuss would merely be a repetition of the voting on the inscription issue. The United Kingdom would probably suffer another defeat.

4. The move to crowd the item off this year's agenda is perhaps even less satisfactory. We are not sure how this aim would be accomplished but we assume that some delegation might move that because the agenda was too long, a specific item or items should be dropped. It might not be easy for us to associate ourselves with such a move. Furthermore, as the United Kingdom authorities are fully aware, this alternative would amount to little more than the postponement of the item until next session. In our view such a postponement would be perhaps less palatable than an Assembly endorsement of the Greek draft resolution.

5. Referring to our Telegram No. 741 of December 2,[†] although we do not place too much reliance on the Greek Delegation's unofficial hope concerning Cyprus and future Assembly agenda, if the Greeks are not keen to press the matter beyond the present session, it might not matter too much if their draft resolution were to be accepted by the majority of the Assembly, over the firm opposition of a substantial number of delegations which would no doubt include many of Greece's NATO partners. We are somewhat surprised that the Greeks should have admitted, even privately, that the Cyprus item had been merely an experiment at the present session. It is doubtful whether the advantages which will accrue to the Papagos Government from this action will outweigh the mischief which has been done by the raising of the matter at the General Assembly.

For the present we are directing our attention to two courses of action which are likely to come into play successively in the expected debate on Cyprus. They relate to:

(a) The so-called "motion not to discuss" which will be a procedural measure introduced by one or more of the United Kingdom's friends (telegram from Canada House suggests Pakistan or Denmark) and designed to choke off the debate on the Cyprus item; and

(b) The Greek draft resolution which was contained in your Telegram No. 699 of November 30.

2. Regarding (a), while we are still to be persuaded that this procedural move is wise or that it will succeed, we are prepared to accept the United Kingdom assessment that several delegations may have shifted their position from that taken on the inscription issue and that, if there should be a large number of abstentions, the voting on the procedural motion might go in favour of the United Kingdom. This result is more likely to be obtained if the United States does conduct a vigorous lobby for support, adding its influence to that of Turkey. It would be entirely consistent with our vote against inscription to vote in favour of a motion or a resolution to stop the debate, although we retain strong doubts that rule 114, which deals with points of order, provides the necessary basis for the procedure which the United Kingdom have in mind (your 852 of December 10).†

3. What is being attempted is to create a new rule of procedure applicable to the case of Cyprus. Even though we would not wish you to work actively to that end, you may wish to point out to the British that if the resolution fails to stop the debate at an early stage, a similar resolution could still be presented later on since it would be preferable that the debate conclude on such a resolution than on the Greek resolution. A decision to that end, however, would have to be based on the expectation that the Greek resolution would not carry.

4. As for (b) in paragraph 1, if notwithstanding the procedural motion, the substantive debate on Cyprus is proceeded with and is based upon the present Greek draft, the Canadian Delegation should be prepared to vote against the resolution, unless the circumstances now foreseen alter substantially. You are already aware of our views on the Greek draft (Léger's memorandum for the Minister of November 30 and our telegram No. 522 of December 2† addressed to PERMDEL), and of our broad conclusion that on the Cyprus issue we could give no less support to the United Kingdom than that given by the United States.

5. The Delegation should not participate in the debate on substance and should confine its remarks if at all necessary to an explanation of the vote which might among other things:

(a) reiterate in effect the arguments you have already expressed on the inscription issue;

(b) restate the doubts we have voiced at earlier sessions concerning attempts to have formally recognized by the General Assembly the so-called "right" to self-determination when no such right is established by the Charter;

(c) express our regret that the raising of the issue at the Assembly has occasioned ill feeling between member states concerned with the status of Cyprus and had an unsettling effect in the area of Cyprus.

6. We have told Earncliffe that we would vote with them but that we would not wish to intervene in the debate.

7. We hope these views will assist you in discussing this matter with friendly delegations, particularly at the Commonwealth meeting on December 13. We shall be grateful for reports on any changes in the present situation which you think might affect the views we have expressed in this telegram.

When Committee One met this morning it had before it the Greek resolution¹⁷ which was tabled first and the New Zealand resolution providing that the item be not considered further (see my telegram No. 852 of December 10).† As soon as the Chairman had declared the debate open, Munro of New Zealand, who had agreed to carry the ball on behalf of the United Kingdom, asked to speak on a point of order.

This resolution is the same as the one in Document 132 amended by the deletion of paragraphs 3 and 4.

He declared that his delegation had submitted its resolution because of its concern at the grave political consequences of a vote on the substance of the issue. He requested that his resolution be discussed and voted on before any discussion of the Greek resolution. He said, however, that he was not attempting to prevent a full expression of Greek views.

2. Kyrrou of Greece declared that he was thoroughly opposed to any plan for not discussing the issue. The New Zealand resolution would require a two-thirds majority under Rule 124 because it in effect reversed a decision of the General Assembly which, by inscribing an item on the agenda, intended the item to be discussed.

3. As prearranged by the United Kingdom delegation, Turkey, Pakistan, United States, Denmark, Sweden, Brazil and the Philippines spoke in favour, during the course of a somewhat confused discussion, of the New Zealand motion for priority submitted in the following terms:

“That the draft resolution contained in Document A/C.1/L.125 do have priority in discussion and vote over the draft resolution contained in Document A/C.1/L.124.”

The representative of El Salvador supported Kyrrou in his contention that a two-thirds majority was required and the U.S.S.R. and Poland made statements objecting to the terms of both the New Zealand resolution and the motion for priority.

4. Throughout this confused and at times heated discussion, Urrutia was in a most uncomfortable position as chairman of the committee. He declared that Kyrrou was correct in saying that if the item were not discussed Munro's resolution “not to consider further” would require a two-thirds majority. He allowed a number of statements to be made on the New Zealand proposal for priority until the Norwegian representative moved under Rule 118 that the debate be closed. This motion of closure was adopted by 45 votes in favour, none against and 12 abstentions (including Yugoslavia and some Arab-Asian and Latin delegations).

5. The New Zealand proposal for priority, (which Kyrrou declared at this point was “absolutely out of order”.) was then adopted by 28 in favour, 15 against and 16 abstentions. (We voted for the proposal.) The Chairman said that the priority resolution had carried and then stated that a two-thirds majority would be required for the main New Zealand proposal if no debate were held. Kyrrou asked that the vote be taken at once on the New Zealand resolution but the Chairman declared that as the general debate on the New Zealand resolution had opened and as he had speakers on his list, the general debate would proceed.

6. Three strong statements were then delivered by Munro of New Zealand, Lodge of the United States and Nutting of the United Kingdom in support of the New Zealand resolution. All three statements stressed the strategic aspect of the problem. Nutting declared that his delegation would not deal with questions of sovereignty because those questions were not raised by the New Zealand resolution. He did ask, however, that all delegations “solemnly ponder” on the consequences of the assembly intervening on the Cyprus question.

7. The Chairman's ruling that a two-thirds majority would not be required for the New Zealand resolution if a general debate were held had not been fully understood by most delegations and in their statements, Lodge and Nutting reiterated their view that a two-thirds majority would not be required. Kyrrou spoke briefly near the end of the morning meeting to emphasize that such a majority was needed. At the close of the meeting, the Chairman made it clear that because the general debate had begun, a two-thirds majority would not be required for the New Zealand resolution, since before the vote the committee would have given some consideration to the Cyprus question.

8. Kyrrou mentioned in his last statement that he would make a lengthy speech this afternoon. During this morning's discussion he had argued that the New Zealand resolution was intended to gag him while Munro had repeatedly reassured him that there would be a full opportunity to make a substantive statement. If, immediately after the vote on closure and before the vote on priority, Kyrrou had proclaimed that he would not take part in the debate if the New Zealand proposal were adopted, he might have succeeded in securing a number of the votes of those who abstained. He failed — or was prevented by the Chairman's decision that no interventions would be permitted at this stage — to make this announcement and thus missed the opportunity of striking the United Kingdom plan of action at its weakest point. With this opportunity gone, Kyrrou's subsequent declaration of his intention of speaking in the general debate was undoubtedly based on the knowledge that the debate on the New Zealand resolution would probably give him his only chance at this session to put the Greek case on the record.

9. On the other hand, Hethereby abandoned his main justification for requesting that Article 124 be applied to the voting on the main New Zealand resolution. In any case, as Kyrrou knows, the Greek delegation can argue in plenary that the New Zealand resolution (if adopted in committee) is an important question requiring a two-thirds majority. This is now the chief worry of the United Kingdom delegation who will say in plenary that the resolution is procedural, requiring only a simple majority.

The United States delegation received instructions this morning that they should support the United Kingdom delegation's bid for a simple majority being required in plenary to secure the adoption of the New Zealand resolution (not to consider further the Cyprus question) in whatever [form] it emerges from the First Committee.

2. When we discussed this plan of campaign at a Commonwealth meeting this morning (before we knew the United States position), I said that, although I was without instructions, I thought we might have difficulty in supporting the United Kingdom on this procedural point. I did not recall any occasion on which the Canadian delegation had opposed the application of Rule 85 on major political questions even when only the procedure for dealing with them was involved. In the present case, the New Zealand resolution would presumably be the only action to be taken by the Assembly on the Cyprus question. Our disposition in the past had been to feel that an Assembly resolution on an important subject which did not secure a two-thirds majority did not commend sufficient support to make it worth very much. It seemed to me that the Assembly's rules in this respect differed from the Security Council's where there was a clear distinction between substantive and procedural questions for purposes of the veto. I also pointed out that the French were hoping to upset part of the Moroccan resolution (also a postponement resolution) if necessary by the application of the two-thirds rule.

3. Although Duplessis of South Africa agreed with my hesitation in voting for a simple majority decision when the Western group so often need to invoke the two-thirds rule themselves, Lall of India and Munro of New Zealand thought they would be able to support dealing with this question by simple majority.

4. Nutting said he thought the rules could be so interpreted as to justify taking a decision to postpone by a simple majority consideration of an item inscribed by simple majority. This was clearly the common sense solution, he said, since, if the New Zealand resolution was not adopted, the Greeks could commence in plenary a discussion of their own resolution and have it put to the vote which was precisely what the New Zealand resolution was intended to avoid. He appealed to me privately after the meeting on the basis that our vote might be crucial and that a procedural resolution which did not deal with the merits of the case could not really be called important although the question of Cyprus certainly was important.

5. In view of your general instructions that Canada should not give the United Kingdom less support than the United States was prepared to give, I take it that you will wish me to go along with the proposition that the New Zealand resolution requires only a simple majority in plenary despite our misgivings.

6. I expect this question will be decided in plenary on Friday, December 17.¹⁸

DISARMAMENT DISCUSSION AT NINTH SESSION OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

The participation of the Canadian Government at the London meetings of the Sub-committee of the Disarmament Commission, held between May 13 and July 15, 1954, was based upon the following premises:

(i) Our interest is in achieving substantial disarmament, and not in catering to a false sense of security;

(ii) Effective measures in the disarmament field depend upon the establishment of a climate of international confidence and decreasing tension;

(iii) In considering the problems of disarmament the only certain method of eliminating atomic warfare is to eliminate war itself.

2. The Sub-committee discussions were marked by the introduction of important new proposals by the Governments of France and the United Kingdom. The principal points in these proposals, the details of which are given in Annex 9 of the attached report of the Sub-committee — DC/53 of June 22, 1954, were:

(i) A proposal to ban the use of nuclear weapons except in defence against aggression.

(ii) The division of the prohibition of nuclear weapons into three phases:

(a) The conditional ban on the use,

(b) The ban on manufacture to come into effect after half the agreed reductions in conventional armaments and armed forces has been completed,

(c) The total prohibition and elimination of nuclear weapons after the completion of the second half of the agreed reductions in conventional armaments and armed forces.

(iii) The phased introduction of the control organ.

(iv) The freeze on military expenditure and overall military manpower as soon as the control organ is able to enforce it.

(v) The completion of the agreed reductions of conventional armaments and armed forces in two phases.

¹⁹ Approuvé par L.B. Pearson le 7 octobre 1954./Approved by L.B. Pearson on October 7, 1954.

3. The United States Representatives expressed "their general support" of the above proposals which were "not inconsistent with basic United States concepts". They said, however, that they could not accept the interpretation placed on the proposals by M. Moch but that their general support applied to the proposals "as interpreted by Mr. Lloyd".

(a) M. Moch had indicated that he considered the ban on the use of atomic weapons except to meet aggression as a new proposal.

(b) Mr. Lloyd had said that there was nothing new in the obligation not to use atomic weapons except to meet aggression since that obligation was implicit in the Charter.

4. Specific United States objections to the Anglo-French proposals were:

(i) That the U.S. does not want even a conditional ban on the use of nuclear weapons separated from the comprehensive disarmament treaty.

(ii) The U.S. would not be satisfied with the loose type of inspection by "sampling" envisaged by M. Moch during the first stage.

(iii) The U.S. considers it would not be compatible with its national security to accept an 80% or 90% effective plan now but preferred to maintain its position that any control plan for "safe-guarded disarmament" must be "no less effective" than the majority plan for atomic energy.

(iv) The U.S. would be most reluctant to give complete data on its atomic production and plant capacities at the beginning of the second stage, before there had been a reduction of armed forces and conventional armaments.

5. The Soviet position included a significant concession, namely, that it no longer required a total unconditional prohibition of the use and manufacture of atomic weapons as a precondition of disarmament but indicated that it would be content with a prohibition on the use of such weapons. Apart from this, however, the Soviet position seemed to be what it had always been:

(a) A cut of one-third in the armaments and armed forces of the Five Great Powers;

(b) Simultaneous entry into force of effective international control of these arrangements.

6. The Russian proposals were unacceptable to the Western Powers if for no other reason than because the Soviet Representative refused to admit that the control organ should be given adequate powers or established and positioned before the entry into force of any agreed prohibition and reduction.

7. Reporting on the discussions in the Disarmament Sub-committee Mr. Robertson said, in a TOP SECRET despatch No. 1180, June 23,[†] that he thought:

"the Western Powers should be careful to avoid putting themselves in the position of making a series of unilateral concessions. Perhaps the chief lesson to be learned from the London talks is that the Soviet Government does not consider the present time opportune for serious negotiations and is still seeking to derive the last ounce of propaganda advantage from its latest 'Ban the Use of the Bomb' proposal. In these circumstances it is the line of least resistance to stand on a fixed position. This course of action can be justified by the undeniable fact that up to the present time the question of disarmament has been treated largely as a propaganda exercise and that any agreement in this field is almost certainly unattainable. Although this line of reasoning is unassailable, if the cold war premise is accepted, it is just possible that it might not be true; and for this reason we cannot afford to give up too easily."

8. In view of the apparent stalemate, the Western Powers concerned felt it to be of primary importance for them to present a united front at the ninth session. Accordingly, the United Kingdom drafted a suggested resolution to be co-sponsored by itself, France, the United States and Canada. The text of this draft is given in telegram No. 767 of September 15, copy of which is attached. Subsequently, the United States prepared a draft (see attached telegram No. 78 of September 29) which, unlike the United Kingdom draft, made no mention of the Sub-committee discussions nor of the proposals put forward by the U.K. and France in those discussions. In an effort to retain some of the more positive and constructive tone of the U.K. draft, and in order not to lose the possible propaganda advantage of declaring willingness not to use atomic weapons except to meet aggression, a number of suggestions for amending the United States proposed draft were put forward in our telegram No. 76 of September 30, copy of which is attached.

9. The latest development (see telegrams Nos. 83, 90 and 94 of September 30)† is that the Soviet Union is proposing to introduce its own resolution containing what appear to be additional significant concessions. The gist of the U.S.S.R. proposal is that the Disarmament Commission should prepare a treaty for submission to the Security Council taking as a basis for discussion the Anglo-French proposals but including the following fundamental conditions:

(a) The simultaneous reduction of armed forces, armaments and military budgets within 6 or 12 months by one-half of the difference between the levels of December 31, 1953, and fixed levels or norms to be agreed, together with control of this reduction by means of a temporary commission set up by the Security Council to which governments would be required to furnish the information necessary for insuring that the reductions were actually carried out;

(b) Simultaneously with the completion of the reductions in conventional arms, forces and budgets within 6 or 12 months, there should be a total prohibition of all mass destruction weapons together with the establishment of a permanent international control organization which would have powers of permanent inspection and the necessary scope to insure the execution of the prohibition.

10. The Soviet proposals are chiefly remarkable for the absence of any reference to banning even the use of atomic weapons as a precondition of acceptance of a disarmament scheme and the adoption instead of at least a temporizing attitude toward the Western concept of a conditional prohibition except in defence against aggression, to which the Soviet Government feel the Disarmament Commission might devote additional study. These proposals are also noteworthy in the following respects:

(a) The traditional Soviet demand for "proportionate reduction" in conventional armaments and armed forces is abandoned in favour of the Western concept of agreed norms;

(b) The Anglo-French proposals are accepted as a basis for discussion.

11. In assessing what the Canadian attitude should now be, the following considerations would seem relevant:

(i) The premises listed in paragraph one above appear still to be valid.

(ii) It is unlikely that the U.S.S.R. has jettisoned its propaganda objectives and is now sincerely searching for a practicable solution to the disarmament problem, although the possibility of mixed motives should never be ruled out.

(iii) Nevertheless the Soviet proposal will undoubtedly tend to give the U.S.S.R. the initiative in the eyes of the world.

(iv) It will be up to the West to devise an attitude that will protect its position (especially with respect to the need for disclosure, adequate control and inspection machinery) without making it appear that they are callously throwing cold water on what the man in the street will probably regard as a forthcoming Russian proposal.

12. Accordingly, in line with the suggestion made in paragraph 4 of telegram No. 90²⁰ and subject to the continuing and over-riding need for Western unity on disarmament questions, it would seem appropriate to instruct our Delegation to urge the other Western Powers:

(a) To express cautious welcome of the Soviet proposals, noting that they seem to indicate a less negative approach than that hitherto adopted by the U.S.S.R.

(b) To agree to accept those proposals as a basis for further discussion (preferably in a renewed session of the Sub-committee) on the assumptions that the U.S.S.R. is sincere in its desire to find a solution and that the U.S.S.R. will co-operate, in fact, in seeking practicable and workable arrangements for inspection and control as a sine qua non of any such solution.

(c) To emphasize that there is indeed no other way in which the U.S.S.R. can convincingly demonstrate its sincerity, except by recording its recognition that the creation of adequate and authoritative machinery for inspection and control of disarmament is not inimical to its interests, and by joining with the other countries concerned in an honest effort to bring such machinery into effective operation.

²⁰ La suggestion au paragraphe 4 se lit :/The suggestion in paragraph 4 reads:

"Our preliminary inclination, shared by the others at the meeting, was therefore to consider taking up the item next week as planned, and seeking to minimize or avoid subsequent debate by having some appropriate country introduce a resolution referring to the London talks and the new Soviet proposal, and asking the members of the disarmament sub-committee to resume their private meetings in a further effort to reach agreement."

GENERAL ASSEMBLY — DISARMAMENT

Following is text of resolution drafted by United Kingdom delegation. Text begins:

The General Assembly

- a. Reaffirming the responsibility of the United Nations for seeking a solution of the problem of disarmament;
- b. Conscious that the continuing development of armaments increases the urgency of the need for such a solution;
- c. Believing that the solution of international controversies necessary for the establishment of a lasting peace would be considerably aided by an agreement on disarmament, or at least on a substantial reduction of armaments;
- d. Desiring to lighten the burden of armaments in order to facilitate peaceful development and reconstruction;
- e. Having received the fourth report of the Disarmament Commission of the 29th of July 1954, submitted in accordance with General Assembly Resolution 715 (VIII) of the 28th November, 1953;
- f. Endorsing the Commission's hope that circumstances will facilitate a continued and fruitful consideration of the question of disarmament;
 1. Takes note of the fourth report of the Disarmament Commission.
 2. Expresses its regret that the Sub-Committee which the Disarmament Commission established as suggested in General Assembly Resolution 715 (VIII) did not find an acceptable solution to the problem;
 3. Recognizes that the discussions in the Sub-Committee led to the clarification of the views of the powers principally involved, and to the submission of new proposals;
 4. Commends the efforts of those powers which submitted these proposals and which, in a genuine attempt to reach agreement, demonstrated their flexibility of approach to the problem;
 5. Endorses the proposal contained in the memorandum DC/SC1/10 on a comprehensive disarmament programme that provisions should be made in the draft disarmament treaty which the Disarmament Commission is required to prepare covering:

(a) The total prohibition of the use and manufacture of nuclear weapons and weapons of mass destruction of every type, together with the conversion of existing stocks of nuclear weapons for peaceful purposes.

(b) Major reductions in all armed forces and conventional armaments.

(c) The establishment of a control organ with rights and powers and functions adequate to guarantee the effective observance of the agreed prohibitions and reductions.

6. Endorses further the proposal in this memorandum that the provisions in the Disarmament treaty regarding the total prohibition and elimination of nuclear weapons and other weapons of mass destruction and the agreed reductions of armed forces and conventional weapons, should begin to enter into effect as soon as the international control organ, as established by the Treaty, has been constituted and positioned and is able effectively to enforce them;

7. Believes that the proposals in the memorandum DC/SC1/5 would lead to the establishment of an effective international control organ;

8. Requests the Disarmament Commission to make further efforts to seek agreement, on the basis of these memoranda, taking into account the other memoranda already submitted to it;

9. Reminds member states that pending agreement on the total prohibition and elimination of nuclear weapons, they should regard themselves as prohibited in accordance with the terms of the charter from the use of nuclear weapons except in defence against aggression;

10. Requests the Disarmament Commission to submit a further report to the General Assembly and to the Security Council;

11. Calls upon member states and particularly members of the Disarmament Commission to cooperate in efforts to produce agreed proposals. Text Ends.

DISARMAMENT — UNITED STATES DRAFT RESOLUTION

Following is the text of the United States draft resolution on disarmament which will be discussed with members of the United States, United Kingdom, French and Canadian delegations tomorrow morning, September 30. Text Begins:

The General Assembly:

Mindful of the international tensions which grip the world, of which the burden of armaments is evidence, and believing that lasting peace can be firmly based only upon just relations and honest understanding between all nations,

Reaffirming the responsibility of the United Nations for considering the problems of disarmament,

Believing that all nations desire to lighten the burden of armaments and so to release more of the world's human and economic resources for peaceful purposes,

Reaffirming its belief that the increasing development of weapons of great destructive power gives heightened urgency to efforts to reach agreement on a general disarmament system, under adequate safeguards, which will include the prohibition of nuclear weapons and other major weapons adaptable to mass destructions as the result of effective international controls and the regulations, limitation and balanced reduction of other armaments and of armed forces,

1. Takes note of the fourth report of the Disarmament Commission of 29 July 1954, submitted in accordance with General Assembly Resolution 715 (VIII) of 28 November 1953;

2. Endorses the Commission's hope that circumstances will facilitate the continued and fruitful consideration of the question of disarmament, the capital importance of which, in conjunction with other questions affecting the maintenance of international peace, is recognized by all;

3. Reaffirms General Assembly Resolution 715 (VIII) of 28 November 1953 and requests the Disarmament Commission to continue its efforts to reach agreement on the problems with which it is concerned and to report again to the General Assembly and to the Security Council not later than 1 September 1955.

4. Calls on all member states, and in particular the major powers, to cooperate in aiding the Disarmament Commission to reach agreement on the problem with which it is concerned. Text Ends.

2. We expect that this draft rather than the United Kingdom draft will probably form the basis of the draft resolution which may eventually be submitted by the four delegations.

3. We should be grateful for your comments.

DISARMAMENT

The important thing is, of course, to demonstrate Western unity on disarmament and you should go along with any reasonable resolution likely to achieve that purpose.

2. Apart from this general and over-riding consideration we think the United States draft resolution might be improved in the following ways:

(a) In place of United States preamble beginning "mindful" it might be preferable to use the language in para. C of the United Kingdom draft, which is more down to earth and more pertinent to the subject matter of the resolution.

(b) In the second paragraph of the United States draft beginning "Reaffirming" insert the phrase "seeking a solution of" in place of the word "considering". This would inject a positive and hopeful note into the affirmation.

(c) It seems regrettable that the United States draft says nothing about the helpful and thoughtful proposals discussed by the Sub-Committee. Accordingly we think that the draft might at least include between sub-paras. 1 and 2 of its conclusion a new para. reading: "Recognizes that the discussions in the Sub-Committee led to the clarification of the views of the powers principally involved, and to the submission of new proposals".

(d) We also think there might be propaganda advantage in including a paragraph along the lines of para. 9 of the U.K. draft emphasizing willingness to forego the use of nuclear weapons except in defence against aggression.

3. These changes are suggestions only and we are not wedded to them to the extent of wishing to place any obstruction in the way of achieving unanimity among the four co-sponsors which, we repeat, is our primary consideration.

4. With respect to your telegram No. 83, it is not possible to comment on the Russian proposals in the absence of more information. At first sight these appear to represent a further and welcome Soviet concession in as much as there is no longer a precondition of a ban even on the use of atomic weapons. On the other hand, before they could be acceptable to the West, it would be essential to ensure that the inspection and control machinery was adequate in both stages. Ends.

DISARMAMENT DISCUSSIONS

Recent developments in respect of disarmament have been followed closely and in the following paragraphs an attempt is made to provide guidance in dealing with the various immediate questions arising out of these developments. These instructions are, of course, subject to whatever revisions the Minister, to whom we are repeating this message, might wish to make when he has had an opportunity to consider the latest developments.

2. We have noted particularly that the new Soviet proposals appear to offer substantial concessions to the Western point of view in that

(a) they do not include the traditional Soviet demand for an unconditional ban on atomic weapons as a precondition of agreement on disarmament;

(b) they envisage the reduction of conventional arms to fixed levels rather than by percentages; and

(c) they accept the Anglo-French proposals as a basis for further discussion.

3. There are, of course, many aspects of the problem which are not specifically covered in the Soviet proposals, notably the status that is to be given to the United States Working Paper on international control organs in any future talks. The Inter-departmental Working Party on Disarmament has been kept informed of all new developments and its views on the technical features of the Soviet proposals will be sought when and if this seems warranted by the course of the discussions in the Assembly.

Soviet Attempt to Obtain an Additional Agenda Item

4. Without knowing the phraseology of the Soviet request for an additional agenda item for the consideration of the new proposals, it is difficult to assess what our attitude on this question should be. We think that it would be undesirable to discuss the Soviet proposals as a separate item. This would not only waste time but might also tend to suggest that the Soviet proposals are completely new departures divorced from all that has gone before. This might unduly strengthen the erroneous impression that there has been a Soviet initiative, that the Soviet Union's proposals are more positive and hopeful than they might really be, and detract from the recent solid work on disarmament carried out by the Western countries.

5. The same might also be true even if the Soviet item is merely included as a sub-heading of the existing item No. 20 on disarmament. Nevertheless, we think that these risks ought to be run, at least to the extent of agreeing to the inclusion of the Soviet item as a sub-heading of item 20, if we are not to appear unwilling to co-operate with the U.S.S.R. on questions of disarmament. Accordingly when the question is discussed in plenary you should support inclusion of the Soviet item as part of item 20 while attempting at the same time to place the Soviet proposals in their true perspective so as to minimize the disadvantages outlined above.

Attitude to Soviet Proposals

6. Our participation in disarmament discussions continues to be based upon the central premise that our interest is in achieving substantial disarmament, and not in catering to a false sense of security.

7. In line with and subject to this premise we consider that the Western attitude must seek (a) to protect our security position, especially with respect to the need for adequate machinery for disclosure, inspection and control, and (b) to avoid our giving the impression that we wish to dismiss the Soviet proposals out of hand. Although we may feel privately that it is unlikely that the U.S.S.R. is sincerely searching for a workable solution we must act as though there may at least be a possibility of progress, in the exploitation of which we are willing to co-operate with the Soviet Union. Finally, and we consider this of great importance, we must not allow the Assembly to lose sight of the fact that the real initiative did not come from the Soviet Union but from the Anglo-French proposals and United States paper on inspection submitted to the Sub-committee in London, to which the Soviet resolution is a belated response.

8. Accordingly you should urge the delegations of the other Western countries concerned:

(a) to express cautious welcome of the Soviet proposals, noting that they seem to indicate a less negative approach than that hitherto adopted by the U.S.S.R. and emphasizing that they are based on and were preceded by the thoughtful plan worked out by the Western countries in London;

(b) while maintaining the positions set forth in the Anglo-French and United States proposals to accept the Soviet proposals for discussion and study (preferably in a renewed session of the Sub-committee) on the assumption that the U.S.S.R. may be sincere in its desire to find a solution and may co-operate in fact in seeking practicable and workable arrangements for disclosure, inspection and control as a sine qua non of any such solution, and

(c) to emphasize that there is indeed no other way in which the U.S.S.R. can convincingly demonstrate its sincerity except by recording its recognition that the creation of adequate and authoritative machinery for inspection and control of disarmament is not inimical to its interests and by joining with the other countries concerned in an honest effort to bring such machinery into effective operation.

9. In view of the fact that the Assembly has not had the opportunity since last autumn of discussing the disarmament question a number of countries will no doubt feel that it would be desirable to have some airing of problems of disarmament in the Assembly. Indeed while we would hope that any such discussion would be as brief and non-controversial as possible, it would serve to acquaint all members of the Assembly with the very real contribution of a solution of the disarmament problem which was made in London by the submission of the Anglo-French proposals and the United States Working Paper on the establishment of an international control organ. Nevertheless we would hope that detailed discussion of the various proposals now in hand, and in particular, careful investigation and exploration of the Soviet proposals, could be referred by the Assembly to the Sub-Committee of the Disarmament Commission. Such detailed study is not the function of the Assembly itself.

Western Joint Resolution

10. Despite the introduction of the Soviet resolution, we think it would be wise to press on with the drafting of an agreed Western text, because the Western Powers sought to advance matters at London, and because past experience suggests that the Soviet delegation will stick to its own text which does not meet the Western position in every respect. Accordingly we shall look forward to learning what progress may have been made in reaching agreement on an agreed Western resolution in the light of the suggested amendments contained in our telegram No. 76 of September 30. It may indeed be possible if the Soviets wish to appear conciliatory that a final text might be agreed providing for a reference to the Commission and the Subcommittee (which have already considered the Western proposals) of the Soviet texts.

Timing of the Discussions

11. In your telegram No. 90 of September 30† you indicated that there might be a move to postpone consideration of the disarmament item until later in the Assembly. We strongly suspect that the Soviet initiative in putting forward their proposals was carefully timed to coincide with the London talks on the German problems and that the Soviet delegation would attempt to use a postponement to its own advantage in similar fashion. For this and the other reasons outlined in paragraph 4 of your message, we think there is much to be said for continuing as planned with the discussion of disarmament as the first item on the agenda of the First Committee.

12. We understand that Mr. Pearson may find it possible to be present in New York for these discussions, and we shall keep you informed as soon as his plans are final.²¹

DISARMAMENT

I am grateful for your prompt and detailed guidance on what is shaping up as the most important political problem before this assembly.

2. Although the positions of the delegations principally concerned with disarmament are still quite fluid, there have been some preliminary exchanges on how the first committee debate should be handled.

²¹ Pearson se trouvait en Europe pour participer aux discussions de l'OTAN sur le problème allemand. Voir le chapitre 3, 4^e partie.

Pearson was in Europe for NATO discussions on the German problem. See Chapter 3, Part 4.

3. Moch and Selwyn Lloyd discussed this yesterday evening and found themselves in general agreement on the following points:

(a) There will have to be a full debate in the First Committee to satisfy the interest and concern of the smaller countries; but

(b) A full technical examination of the Soviet proposals can best be undertaken in private in a small group;

(c) To reconstitute the disarmament sub-committee would mean reconvening the Disarmament Commission and would cause some delay;

(d) It might therefore be desirable, after perhaps two weeks' debate in the First Committee, to constitute a sub-committee consisting of Canada, France, USSR, United Kingdom and U.S.A. to meet in private under the Chairmanship of someone who could symbolize the participation of the smaller countries in our work as Nervo did in Paris;

(e) The sub-committee could be instructed to report back to the General Assembly before the end of its present session.

4. The principal considerations for the United Kingdom and United States delegations (and I presume for the Canadian delegation also) are:

(a) To find out as soon as we can whether the new Soviet proposals are something more substantial than a means of stalling German re-armament by increasing French hesitations; and

(b) For this reason, to get into a private technical examination of the Soviet proposals without delay so that, if control continues to be the stumbling block, this fact can be exposed before the French assembly face ratification of the London agreement on Germany.

5. We have learned very confidentially from the United Kingdom delegation that as soon as Moch heard of the Soviet proposals he cabled Mendes-France saying that, although the British offer to commit troops to continental defence on a long-term basis, together with the proposals for armaments control, met most of his misgivings, he thought France should not ratify the London agreement until there had been an opportunity to explore the new possibilities of agreement on disarmament. Although Lloyd was at first afraid Moch might be tempted to put off sub-committee examination of the Soviet proposals until January, he is now reassured that Moch is ready to proceed without delay during the present session of the assembly.

6. As regards paragraph 9 of your telegram under reference, would you agree, on the basis of the information we have reported above, to allow the smaller members of the First Committee enough time to debate disarmament, probably beginning next Monday, so that they will not feel the great powers are giving them the brush-off?²² The Indians, from indications we have had from them, are particularly sensitive on this score because they are not members of the Disarmament Commission or the sub-committee.

²² Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Yes [J.W. Holmes]

7. Would you also agree to having an assembly sub-committee set up, for the sake of speed, consisting of Canada, France, USSR, United Kingdom and U.S.A. under some neutral Chairman such as Nervo, Urrutia (Chairman of committee one) or Entezam?²³

8. As regards your paragraph 10, Vyshinsky blandly asserted in the general committee yesterday that the Soviet proposal was the only proposal before the assembly. If he presses this preposterous assertion, the principal western delegations may consider putting in a resolution on the Anglo-French proposals. In any case, the tabling of the new Soviet proposals has, in the eyes of the United Kingdom and United States delegations, more or less antiquated the previous draft resolutions of these two delegations. Although we have taken up with them the points made in your telegram No. 76 of September 30, the United Kingdom delegation is at present thinking of the possibility of reviving the informal Canadian draft prepared in London during the sub-committee talks last June which incorporated the Anglo-French proposals in resolution form. What are your views on reviving this Canadian draft to offset a possible Soviet resolution presenting their counter-proposals in resolution form? The United Kingdom delegation fear Vyshinsky may capitalize on the more specific form of presentation of the Soviet proposals if the Western Powers have not an equally specific alternative.

9. As regards the timing of the discussions, the Soviet delegation will not object to disarmament being taken first in the First Committee and to a concurrent discussion of the two items on disarmament which will be inscribed separately this afternoon on the recommendation of the general committee.

DISARMAMENT

We agree with para. 6 of your telegram No. 154 that it would be desirable to permit a general, though preferably brief, airing of the disarmament question in the First Committee. This would help to avoid giving the smaller countries the impression that we think their views are unimportant. In addition, the fact that we have heard their views in the First Committee, may stand us in good stead should it become necessary to forestall their representation in the private talks.

²³ Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Yes [J.W. Holmes]

2. We feel it would be unfortunate if countries other than those represented on the existing Disarmament Sub-committee took part in the private talks envisaged, since this might obstruct our fundamental purpose of seeking to force the U.S.S.R. to demonstrate its real intentions for good or ill as soon as possible.

3. With respect to para. 7 of your telegram No. 154, you have yourself given a forceful answer in your telegram No. 162. We are, therefore, opposed to the formation of an ad hoc sub-committee of the General Assembly for the purpose of discussing the disarmament proposals. Instead you should urge that the necessary private talks be held in a reconvened session of the Sub-committee of the Disarmament Commission. We do not think that the time that might be lost in reconvening these bodies would be sufficiently great to endanger the realization of our fundamental purpose. Substantial progress has been made by using this machinery, which was specifically created for the task now at hand. It would be illogical and certainly of doubtful value to change this machinery at this stage of the negotiations, especially since this would open the way to potentially embarrassing and protracted arguments on the question of representation. We would hope that the Indians would not press for a seat on the Sub-committee at this time, in view of the fact that in private conversations with us they expressly disclaimed any desire for a seat during the discussions on the constitution of the Sub-committee before the London talks and said that this attitude had been communicated to Vyshinsky. It may be that Mr. Menon's zeal is greater than that of his Government on this issue. However, we should not wish to oppose India's candidacy publicly, and for this reason it would be best to stick to the existing Sub-committee with its restricted membership. Should any Government feel exceptionally strongly that it should be allowed to present views during the Sub-committee talks, it might be possible, though perhaps not wholly desirable, for the Sub-committee or the Disarmament Commission to invite them to attend on an ad hoc basis.

4. On the question of timing, as has been said, we feel strongly that the greatest advantage is likely to lie in the expeditious handling of this question not only to forestall any possible Soviet attempt to postpone discussion to a moment advantageous to the U.S.S.R. but also to expedite the exposing of the true Soviet motives. Accordingly you should work for a procedure that would enable the Sub-committee of the Disarmament Commission to be reconvened as soon as possible, having in mind, of course, the need to allow adequate time for the expression of views of other interested Governments in the First Committee. In view of the possibility that the Soviet concessions are timed to influence ratification in France of the West Europe Defence arrangements, it would be best to leave flexible the time of the obligation on the Sub-committee to report back (presumably through the Disarmament Commission) to the Assembly. Perhaps some such wording as the obligation to report as soon as progress warrants would permit the Western Powers to retain control over the timing of any second phase of the public debate in the General Assembly. We should like further information about United States views as to timing, and also about Mr. Moch's thinking. Obviously we would hope that he is not inadvertently playing into the hands of the Soviets, since this might jeopardize the unified Western approach should our suspicions about Soviet good faith prove true. The maintenance of Western unity on the disarmament question is a matter of the greatest importance.

5. We think your suggestion for a revival of the draft Canadian resolution prepared during the London talks is a good one. The text of this draft will, however, require changing from that embodied in London telegram to Permanent Delegation No. 11 of June 1, 1954.† The preamble and the first paragraph of that text would be appropriate but we think the rest of the draft should read along the following general lines:²⁴

(2) Reaffirms the obligations inherent in the Charter of the United Nations, and accepted by all member nations, not to use their arms and armaments, including nuclear weapons, except in defence against aggression.

(3) Requests the Disarmament Commission immediately to reconvene its Sub-committee for the purpose of preparing for eventual presentation to a World Disarmament Conference including all states possessing substantial armed forces and armaments, a comprehensive disarmament convention covering all types of weapons, all types of armed forces and military facilities of all kinds.

(4) Considers that the basis of the private talks to be held in the Sub-committee and of the discussions in the Disarmament Commission should be the Anglo-French proposals, including the plan for inspection and control which they envisage, and the recent proposals of the U.S.S.R.

(5) Requests the Disarmament Commission to report back to the General Assembly as soon as the progress that may be made in the Sub-committee talks would warrant such a report and, in any event, before the end of the current session of the General Assembly.

6. While we think it doubtful that the Soviet delegation will agree to one resolution, we think it worth keeping the Western text as simple and non-controversial as possible in order to exploit any such possibility there may be.

7. The foregoing was drafted before Mr. Martin's latest telephone conversation with Mr. Léger. We are by no means wedded to the above draft although we think it is on the right line and will await arrival of joint text on which you have been working in New York before taking a final decision as to co-sponsorship.

²⁴ Le préambule et le premier paragraphe de la résolution transmise à la délégation permanente dans le télégramme n° 11 du 1^{er} juin 1954 se lisent comme suit :/The preamble and the first paragraph of the resolution transmitted to the Permanent Delegation in telegram No. 11 of June 1, 1954 read as follows:

DISARMAMENT

Yesterday afternoon, concerned at the divergent and relatively uncongealed ideas among friendly western delegations regarding how the disarmament item should be handled, we suggested to Selwyn Lloyd that representatives of United Kingdom, United States, French and Canadian delegations should meet, and he called such a meeting for this morning. We also arranged a private Canadian-American meeting yesterday evening, which I have reported separately in my telegram under reference.

2. At the quadrapartite meeting held this morning in the British offices it was agreed that the regular disarmament item and the Soviet disarmament item should be inscribed as the first two items on the agenda and discussed together. Lloyd then produced a first draft of a resolution which he suggested should be introduced immediately the committee takes up the item. It could, Lloyd said, be amended later in whatever ways seemed appropriate in the light of the debate, but by introducing it now, and having the Soviet item as second on the agenda it would presumably come up for a vote before the Soviet resolution which would be tactically useful. Its early introduction would also prevent Vyshinsky repeating his claim that his resolution is the only disarmament proposal before this Assembly. There was general agreement on these points.

3. On the text of the resolution there was a certain amount of discussion and a somewhat revised text was worked out by a drafting group of the four delegations. The text, as it now stands, is being sent to you in my immediately following telegram.

4. We would appreciate your very early comments on the text. These should, if possible, be received this afternoon or Saturday morning. Our own feeling is that the text is now entirely satisfactory (though it might be desirable to delete the provision at the end that the sub-committee must in any case report "by September 1955", as this seems to detract from the force of the instructions to report "as soon as possible", and might make it more difficult to resist pressure for a report back during this Assembly).

5. Sponsorship. We see considerable advantages in having United Kingdom sponsorship alone, since they would thus retain flexibility of control in their own hands. Lloyd himself would like this best. However, it will probably be impossible to resist Moch's desire to co-sponsor. Lloyd, therefore, hopes that we and the Americans will also agree to co-sponsor, and I feel we should do this if the Americans do so. We would like your authority for this by the end of this afternoon, if possible.

6. Moch suggested that the ideal would be five-power sponsorship with the U.S.S.R. as the fifth. Wadsworth for the United States said that he was not at all sure that he would be authorized to co-sponsor with the U.S.S.R., though he promised to seek instructions on this.

7. (Having the Soviet co-sponsor, while superficially attractive, would in our view be very unwise as it would give the world a dangerously false impression of unity, and imply a much greater agreement than there is as yet any evidence for. Moreover, if Vyshinsky agreed to co-sponsor providing the resolution were slightly amended say to provide for a report back to this assembly, then it would probably be difficult to keep Moch in line as he would probably wish to accept such an amendment. Selwyn Lloyd privately agrees with us on this though neither of us said so at the meeting.)

8. Moch said that his attitude on further procedure will depend on Vyshinsky's answers to twenty questions which he proposes to put to him on Monday morning.

9. Moch, and also Lloyd, seemed at first to envisage about three weeks of debate in the first committee, before the resolution was approved. (Lloyd had told us privately that one advantage he sees in a long disarmament debate is that it makes it more likely that the item on Cyprus will be reached sufficiently late to facilitate adjournment of the assembly without discussing it! This in our view shows a false proportion on the importance of the items.)

10. Our own view is that it would be desirable, if possible, to have the disarmament debate end with a resolution along the lines of the revised draft, after say 10 or 12 days of debate. It could then be passed through plenary so that the Disarmament Commission could meet forthwith and the sub-committee begin work during the Assembly session. The Americans still, however, hope that the sub-committee meetings could be postponed until after the new year.

DISARMAMENT — DRAFT RESOLUTION

Following is text of resolution on disarmament drafted by Working Group of Canadian-French-U.S.-U.K. delegations this morning. Text begins:

“The General Assembly

Re-affirming the responsibility of the United Nations for seeking a solution for the disarmament problem

Conscious that the continuing development of armaments increases the urgency of the need for such a solution

Having considered the fourth report of the Disarmament Commission of the 29th July, 1954, and the documents annexed thereto²⁵

Concludes that a further effort should now be made to reach agreement on proposals to be embodied in a draft international disarmament convention which should include, among others, provisions covering the following:

(a) The total prohibition of the use and manufacture of nuclear weapons and weapons of mass destruction of every type, together with the conversion of existing stocks of nuclear weapons for peaceful purposes;

(b) Major reductions in all armed forces and conventional armaments;

(c) The establishment of a control organ with rights, powers and functions adequate to guarantee the effective observance of the agreed prohibitions and reductions.

Requests the Disarmament Commission to seek an acceptable solution of the disarmament problem on the basis of the Anglo-French proposals of the 11th June, 1954, (DC/SC.1/10)²⁶ which have been accepted by the U.S.S.R. as a basis for an international disarmament convention, taking also into account any other proposals within its terms of reference;

Suggests that the Disarmament Commission again consider the desirability of establishing a sub-committee as proposed in operative paragraphs 6 and 7 of General Assembly resolution No. 715;²⁷

Requests that Disarmament Commission to report to the Security Council and to the General Assembly as soon as possible and not later than September 1.” Text ends.

DISARMAMENT: DRAFT RESOLUTION

The Americans cannot agree to co-sponsor the disarmament resolution we drafted this morning and it is even in doubt whether they could support the resolution in its present form if it were co-sponsored by the United Kingdom and French delegations.

2. The four delegations will meet tomorrow morning to consider what we should do. It seems to us that the best course would now be to find out the minimum changes required by the United States delegation to enable them to support the resolution if co-sponsored by the United Kingdom and French delegations.

DISARMAMENT RESOLUTION — UNITED STATES' REVISION

Following is text of State Department revision of four power disarmament resolution: Text begins:

The General Assembly

Reaffirms the responsibility of the United Nations for seeking a solution for the disarmament problem,

Conscious that the continuing development of armaments increases the urgency of the need for such a solution;

Having considered the fourth report of the disarmament Commission of 29 July 1954 and the documents annexed thereto

1. Concludes that a further effort should now be made to reach agreement on comprehensive and coordinated plans providing for:

(a) The regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of all armed forces and all armaments;

(b) The elimination and prohibition of all major weapons including bacteriological adaptable to mass destruction;

(c) The effective international control of nuclear energy to ensure the prohibition of hydrogen and atomic weapons and the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes only.

The whole program to be carried out under effective international control in such a way that no state would have cause to fear that its security was endangered.

(Alternatively:

Concludes that a further effort should now be made to reach agreement on a general disarmament system under adequate safeguards which will include the prohibition of nuclear weapons and other major weapons adaptable to mass destruction as the result of effective international control and the regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of other armaments and armed forces.)

2. Requests the Disarmament Commission in seeking an acceptable solution of the disarmament problem to take into account the Anglo-French proposal of 11 June 1954 which has been accepted by the U.S.S.R. as a basis for an international disarmament convention, the United States working paper of 25 May 1954 concerning international control organs to implement and enforce disarmament programs, as well as any other proposal within the Commission's terms of reference.²⁸

3. Suggests that the Disarmament Commission again consider the desirability of re-establishing the sub-committee of five as proposed in operative paragraphs 6 and 7 of General Assembly Resolution 715 (VIII),

4. Requests the Disarmament Commission to report to the Security Council and to the General Assembly as soon as possible and not later than September 1, 1955. Text ends.

2. The United States delegation would still like to co-sponsor a resolution along these lines with the United Kingdom, France and Canada. There will be a meeting of the four delegations this morning at 11:30 to see whether we can reach agreement on a text in time to have it on the table on Monday morning. We shall be reporting after this morning's meeting to ask for your authority to co-sponsor whatever item emerges.

DISARMAMENT RESOLUTION

At this morning's meeting of the United Kingdom, United States, French and Canadian delegations, we further revised and combined the four power draft and the United States draft. Your suggestions were substantially accepted. Although for tactical reasons the other delegations would prefer not to include a specific reference to the Soviet counter-proposals at this stage, they agreed that we would probably wish to accept an amendment mentioning the Soviet proposals later.

2. The preamble remains as before, and the operative paragraphs have been revised as follows. Text begins:

"1. Concludes that a further effort should be made to reach agreement on comprehensive and coordinated proposals to be embodied in a draft international disarmament convention providing for:

(a) The regulation, limitation and major balanced reductions of all armed forces and all armaments;

(b) The total prohibition of the use and manufacture of nuclear weapons and weapons of mass destruction of every type, together with the conversion of existing stocks of nuclear weapons for peaceful purposes;

(c) The establishment of effective international control, including a control organ with rights, powers and functions adequate to guarantee the effective observance of the agreed reductions and the prohibition of nuclear and other weapons of mass destruction, and to ensure the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes only; the whole programme to be carried out under effective international control in such a way that no state would have cause to fear that its security was endangered.

2. Requests the Disarmament Commission to seek an acceptable solution of the disarmament problem taking into account the Anglo-French proposals of 11 June 1954 (DC/SC.1/10) which have been accepted by the U.S.S.R. as a basis for an international disarmament convention, as well as any other proposals within the Commission's terms of reference.

3. Suggests that the Disarmament Commission reconvene the sub-committee established in accordance with paragraphs 6 and 7 of General Assembly resolution 715(VIII).

4. Requests the Disarmament Commission to report to the Security Council and to the General Assembly as soon as sufficient progress has been made." Text ends.

3. May we co-sponsor this resolution with France, the United Kingdom and the United States? We are still hoping to secure four power agreement by Monday morning, since Lloyd wants to discuss the resolution in his opening statement, but the French representative this morning indicated that Moch much prefers five power sponsorship, if attainable. The rest of us said we thought it better to have a four power draft tabled early in the debate, rather than to attempt to negotiate an agreed text with the Soviet delegation who have already submitted as a draft resolution their September 30 proposals. If Moch insists, the alternative might be for the United Kingdom to sponsor alone. Realizing this, Moch will probably agree to four power sponsorship.

DISARMAMENT

As you were informed by telephone we consider that the draft set forth in your telegram No. 190 as revised in accordance with paragraph two of your telegram No. 191 is satisfactory. We should have preferred a more specific factual reference to the Soviet counter proposals but are satisfied with the revision as it now stands on the understanding that we shall probably have to accept an amendment mentioning the Soviet proposals in the course of the debate.

2. So far as the question of co-sponsorship is concerned, you are authorized to co-sponsor this resolution, together with the other three Western Powers. If this is unacceptable to the French, we agree that the alternative is for the United Kingdom to sponsor the resolution by itself. We have some sympathy with M. Moch's desire for a five power sponsorship on the assumption that it is his objective to see that the resolution commands Soviet support and that general agreement is reached to refer the Disarmament question as soon as possible to the Sub-committee. On the other hand the essential point is Soviet support rather than Soviet co-sponsorship and there may indeed be a tactical advantage in reminding the Assembly that it was the Western Powers that first put forward new proposals with respect to Disarmament. For this reason we would not repeat not be prepared to take any initiative in securing Soviet co-sponsorship.

DISARMAMENT

After Vyshinsky's speech in the First Committee today, which is being reported separately, I met with Selwyn Lloyd, Jules Moch, Wadsworth, and their principal advisers.

2. The main topic discussed was what if anything to do about the draft resolution. The Americans felt strongly, and we and the British agreed, that it would be useful to have it tabled. There was however considerable backing and filling about sponsorship. Moch thought that sponsorship by the four of us would be undesirable in that it would isolate Vyshinsky. The Americans however could not accept Soviet co-sponsorship and as you know, Lloyd also does not favour this. Moch would be unhappy about the United Kingdom sponsoring alone and for this reason among others Lloyd does not want to do this, though it would in our view be the best solution. Lloyd suggested that Canada should sponsor alone, and France and the United States enthusiastically supported this. We did not encourage the idea, but undertook to submit it to you, and to try to have an answer by Tuesday morning.

3. On balance, my recommendation is that we should do this. Though the Americans, the British and ourselves felt that Vyshinsky's speech showed that they are not prepared to move much if at all on the vital question of the powers of a control organ, and there is in my own view no doubt that their main object is through propaganda to delay or prevent a French decision on the re-arming of Germany, nevertheless the French delegation were in some respects heartened by Vyshinsky's statement. (I understand that Moch yesterday gave Vyshinsky a preview of his "twenty questions".) After the speech today Hoppenot, the French Permanent Delegate, told me that he was confident the Russians wanted peace for at least ten years. This in my view makes the procedural point, of getting the disarmament debate to the Sub-Committee where it can be thrashed out seriously in private, a matter of some importance. The Americans naturally are strongly of this same opinion. However, it seems probable that if we do not sponsor the resolution now agreed between the four of us, no resolution will be put forward at this stage, although we cannot be sure how the situation will develop in the next few days.

4. In any case I would appreciate your instructions, if possible by 11 a.m. tomorrow, as to whether Canada should agree to sponsor the resolution alone.

5. The text of the resolution was gone through, and amended slightly. The amendments are an improvement and are as follows:

The third preamble which begins "having considered" has the following phrase added "and the Soviet draft resolution concerning the conclusion of an international convention on the reduction of armaments and the prohibition of atomic, hydrogen, and other weapons of mass destruction". Sub-paragraph (c) of operative paragraph 1 is amended by changing the phrase "the effective observance of the agreed reductions ..." to "the effective observance of the agreed regulations, limitations and reductions ...". The final sentence of operative paragraph 1 is amended to read as follows: "The whole programme to be such that no state would have cause to fear that its security was endangered".

6. There was also some discussion on the question of timing of action if the resolution is adopted. As you know, the Americans have been opposed to any substantive meeting of the sub-Committee until after French ratification of the NATO and Brussels Treaty revisions. On the other hand, the French have insisted on early meetings of the sub-Committee, and their view is that to seek to prevent early meetings would be to adopt a very unpopular and probably untenable position. At the meeting today, Selwyn Lloyd proposed that the sub-Committee should meet at once, for a week or ten days, after the resolution is adopted (by plenary) and should set up two or three sub-Committees at the official level, charged with bringing in recommendations on such questions as the control organs, phasing and scope. Discussion about the terms of reference of the sub-Committee would doubtless take up three or four meetings and would show signs of activity, without getting to substance. This idea was warmly accepted by both Moch and Wadsworth.

7. I look forward to your early instructions.

DISARMAMENT

Your telegrams under reference were received in the East Block very close to midnight last night and it was not practicable to discuss them with the Minister until first thing this morning. As you were informed on the telephone and in the light of our discussion with the Minister, our view is as follows:

1. On the whole, we continue to prefer a four-power sponsorship of the resolution as revised since this would symbolize a unified Western approach on the question of the next steps to be taken. Failing that, we should have preferred an Anglo-French co-sponsorship. We can understand the difficulties created by M. Moch's attitude which evidently precludes four-power sponsorship, and the reasons why Selwyn Lloyd is not anxious to proceed alone since this might appear to represent some weakening of the joint positions achieved in the Anglo-French memorandum. For these reasons we would be prepared to consider sponsorship by ourselves of such a resolution, which after all is largely procedural rather than substantive. Our final decision, however, depends upon a prior understanding with our partners as to the responsibilities of single sponsorship. As we see the position, if this resolution were to be collectively co-sponsored, the co-sponsors would be bound to consult and reach agreement on the disposition of any amendments which might be put forward in the course of the discussion.

2. In particular, we foresee two main types of amendments. In the first place, the Indians and possibly the Latin Americans may insist on broadening the composition of the Sub-Committee. In the second place, there may be some discussion on the last paragraph of the resolution with respect to the timing of the report back to the General Assembly. If we are asked to sponsor this resolution alone, we must reserve to ourselves the right to accept or reject amendments which might be put forward even though the United States, the United Kingdom and France may desire a firm stand on the text of the resolution as it is now drafted. To be quite specific, should the Indian Government insist on full participation in the Sub-Committee we would not necessarily feel bound to oppose this even though the United States might feel obliged to do so. It would be preferable to clear up this point with the other three Western powers so that there will be no misunderstanding at a later and more decisive stage of the debate.

3. On the substance of the question of composition, we are at this stage satisfied with the draft as it now stands which makes the Sub-Committee of the Disarmament Commission the appropriate body, but the situation may arise where we might not wish to oppose publicly India's candidature (and possibly that of a representative of the Latin American states) and where indeed it might not be desirable to do so. After all this resolution will require a two-thirds majority to be carried and some concessions with respect to membership of the Sub-Committee may have to be made even though the literal position (that it is a "Sub-Committee of the Disarmament Commission") might have to be abandoned. This is a bridge which we shall have to cross when we come to it but it is a point which our friends should accept now rather than tax us at a later stage with bad faith should they feel required to take a different stand on this part of the resolution.

4. In the light of the foregoing we should be grateful if you would discuss the position urgently with the United Kingdom, the United States, and French Delegations and advise us further in the light of which a final decision on sponsorship can be made.

5. We understand that the Soviets have tabled their proposals in the form of a resolution (as contained in your telegram No. 194 of September 30).† The Soviet resolution is substantive rather than procedural and we would assume that an effort will be made to have the Soviets accept our resolution as the best method of considering in detail their own proposals. We should be grateful for clarification of this point and also for word on how the Western powers propose dealing with the Soviet resolution itself.

6. This telegram is intended as a written confirmation for the record of the instructions conveyed to you on the phone at ten o'clock this morning and does not take into consideration subsequent developments. Ends.

DISARMAMENT

After yesterday morning's meeting of the First Committee we had a meeting of the French, United States, United Kingdom and Canadian representatives to consider sponsorship. I explained the conditions you had attached to Canadian sponsorship and made a strong plea for four power sponsorship. After some discussion Moch came up with the ingenious suggestion of Canada sponsoring the resolution, putting it in yesterday afternoon and inviting the other four delegations represented on the Sub-Committee, including Vyshinsky, to co-sponsor today. This we did after obtaining your authority. I am sending you separately the text of my letter† to Vyshinsky.

2. Unfortunately, Lloyd could not attend our meeting and by the time he got word to us agreeing with the procedure proposed, the Canadian resolution was officially submitted half an hour after the Philippines resolution (foreshadowed in yesterday morning's debate in Committee) had been put in. This means that our resolution will in the ordinary course be voted on after the Philippines resolution — a procedural difficulty which would have been avoided had four power sponsorship been attainable earlier as we had urged.

3. Immediately after I speak this morning, it is agreed that Moch, Lloyd and Wadsworth will respond to my invitation to co-sponsor and by the end of the morning the resolution will be in the names of our four delegations. None of us expect Vyshinsky to join us, at least without making conditions we might be unable to accept, but this procedure meets Moch's point of not isolating Vyshinsky from the outset by confronting him with a resolution in the name of the four other powers represented on the Sub-Committee.

4. At yesterday's meeting of the four delegations we also narrowed the gap between the ideas of our four delegations on the timetable for the First Committee's debate and the reconvening of the Sub-Committee. Moch, Wadsworth and I have now tentatively agreed that there should be a full debate in the First Committee lasting probably another week or so; that no attempt should be made to curtail debate in Committee; that there should be no delay in having our resolution confirmed in plenary after it has been adopted in Committee, nor in calling the Disarmament Commission and activating the Sub-Committee. (Sarper of Turkey is Chairman of the Commission for October, Vyshinsky for November). This timetable commits Wadsworth to holding at least some meetings of the Sub-Committee this fall even before November 20 and it also commits Moch to the proposition that there should be no automatic or early deadline by which the Sub-Committee must report during the present session of the Assembly. Lloyd agreed with the timetable later on the understanding that the Sub-Committee when reconvened might spend most of its time initially on technical projects such as examining which weapons should be prohibited and which limited or reduced. Moch has, of course, not agreed that the Sub-Committee should initially be preoccupied with purely technical work.

5. With all the last minute changes of tactics of the past few days, my statement for this morning has grown longer than it would have been if we had had more time. I fear your request in your telegram No. 127 of October 12 for an immediate text of the entire statement will have placed a severe strain on communications in Ottawa as here.

DISARMAMENT — CANADIAN RESOLUTION

To avoid confusion over final wording of Canadian resolution submitted yesterday, text follows:

"The General Assembly,

Reaffirming the responsibility of the United Nations for seeking a solution of the disarmament problem, .

Conscious that the continuing development of armaments increases the urgency of the need for such a solution,

Having considered the fourth report of the Disarmament Commission of 29 July 1954 (D.C./53 and D.C./55), and the documents annexed thereto, and the Soviet draft resolution (A/C.1/750) concerning the conclusion of an international convention (treaty) on the reduction of armaments and the prohibition of atomic, hydrogen, and other weapons of mass destruction,²⁹

1. Concludes that a further effort should be made to reach agreement on comprehensive and co-ordinate proposals to be embodied in a draft international disarmament convention providing for:

(a) The regulation, limitation and major balanced reduction of all armed forces and all armaments;

(b) The total prohibition of the use and manufacture of nuclear weapons and weapons of mass destruction of every type, together with the conversion of existing stocks of nuclear weapons for peaceful purposes;

(c) The establishment of effective international control, through a control organ with rights, powers and functions adequate to guarantee the effective observance of the agreed regulations, limitations and reductions and the prohibition of nuclear and other weapons of mass destruction, and to ensure the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes only;

The whole programme to be such that no state would have cause to fear that its security was endangered;

2. Requests the Disarmament Commission to seek an acceptable solution of the disarmament problem taking into account the Anglo-French proposals of 11 June 1954 (DC/SC.1/10) which have been accepted by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics as a basis for an international disarmament convention, as well as other proposals within the commission's terms of reference;

3. Suggests that the Disarmament Commission reconvene the sub-committee established in accordance with paragraphs 6 and 7 of General Assembly Resolution 715 (VIII);

4. Requests the Disarmament Commission to report to the Security Council and to the General Assembly as soon as sufficient progress has been made." Text ends.

DISARMAMENT — SOVIET AMENDMENTS TO CANADIAN RESOLUTION

Following is text of unofficial translation of the amendments to Canadian disarmament resolution given Johnson by Vyshinsky at Polish delegation party this evening. Acceptance of Soviet amendments would enable them to co-sponsor. Text begins:

1. The resolution should refer in the title not only to the wording of the western disarmament item but also to the Soviet item.

2. Amend paragraph 1(A) to read "major reduction of all armed forces and all conventional armaments;"

3. Amend paragraph 1(C) to read "the establishment of effective international control, through a control organ with the necessary rights, powers and functions to guarantee the effective observance of the agreed reduction of all armaments and armed forces and the prohibition of nuclear and other weapons of mass destruction, and to ensure the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes only;"

4. Amend paragraph 2 to read "requests the Disarmament Commission to find an acceptable solution of the disarmament problem taking into account the Anglo-French proposals of 11 June 1954 (DC/SC.1/10) and the U.S.S.R. draft resolution of 30 September 1954 (S/C.1/750) providing for the conclusion of an appropriate international convention, to be based on the Anglo-French proposals." DISARMAMENT — CANADIAN RESOLUTION

Our comments on Vyshinsky's proposed amendments are as follows:

(1) The text of the Canadian resolution, as given in your No. 226 of October 13, contains no title, and we find it difficult to comment usefully on the title wording. Perhaps as an alternative to giving the Soviet item equal prominence with the Western item, it would be possible to devise a neutral phrase which could include both. In any event, this does not seem to present any insuperable problem.

(2) The language of the proposed amendment in paragraph one (a) is similar though not entirely identical with paragraph two (b) of the Anglo-French memorandum which reads as follows: "Major reductions in all armed forces and conventional armaments". The difference from the Anglo-French memorandum, however, is slight. On the other hand, the principal difference between this Soviet amendment and paragraph one (a) of the Canadian (now four power) resolution would seem to lie in the fact that the reference is to "all forces and all armaments" in the Canadian draft whereas it is restricted to "all armed forces and all conventional armaments". We should welcome clarification of this point, although in our own view it does not constitute a major difficulty when sub-paragraph 1(a) is read in conjunction with 1(b).

(3) We see no substantial difficulty in the acceptance of the Soviet redraft of paragraph 1(c) or even paragraph 2 providing it is acceptable to the other co-sponsors, and contains a reference to "other proposals within the Commission's terms of reference".

2. We should be grateful for your early comments on the Soviet draft amendments on the basis of your consultation with the other three Western powers. In the meantime, the foregoing comments will indicate that on a first study we see no major difficulty, on the basis of the texts, in the way of accepting the Soviet amendments.

3. The position is that, by pre-arrangement with our three partners, an offer has been made to the Soviet Union to co-sponsor what has now become a four-power resolution. We think it would be difficult for the Western powers to refuse to welcome Soviet acceptance on the grounds only of the apparently minor textual amendments suggested by Vyshinsky.

4. We recognize however in this matter, as in many others, the important thing is not only the text itself but the cold war implications of reaching agreement with the Soviet Union on concerted courses of action. If it is assumed, as apparently our United States colleagues assume, that the recent Soviet response in the disarmament field is entirely propagandistic in character there might have been solid ground for avoiding five-power sponsorship. If, however, we consider that, although the Soviet proposals must be viewed with the utmost skepticism, they deserve a thorough study in the appropriate forum, we must welcome Soviet support for our procedural resolution and should not balk at Soviet co-sponsorship (assuming their amendments are not objectionable in themselves). The decision to appeal for Soviet co-sponsorship has already been taken and we consider that the amendments which they have proposed are now to be examined on their merits and on the assumption that there is a chance of the Sub-committee doing some serious work in this important field.

5. Nevertheless, in this as in other aspects of this complicated problem, a principal concern must be the continuance of Western unity, and the four co-sponsors will have to reach agreement on the disposition of the Soviet texts. In our view the four-powers would be well advised to avoid giving Vyshinsky any basis for suggesting that we are unwilling to consider the Soviet amendments on their merits and are merely being frustrated from doing so because of an unwillingness on the part of the United States to accept any kind of Soviet co-sponsorship. All this being said we consider it important that agreement by the Soviet Union to co-sponsor the Canadian resolution, which after all is very largely procedural, should not be allowed to mislead public opinion into thinking that this implies agreement on the substance of a comprehensive disarmament scheme. Time alone can tell. Although we are inclined to think here that Soviet acquiescence in co-sponsorship is primarily a continuation of their general tactics evident in this Assembly of posing as the partisans of peace, for the moment it is consistent with our own interest that there should be agreement on a limited procedure for studying the disarmament problem and we therefore should not reject even this limited offer of Soviet co-operation.

6. We have just seen your teletype No. 238 of October 14† indicating that the main difficulties appear to be centring around paragraph 2. As indicated in our paragraph 1(3) above we do not consider that there are insuperable difficulties in devising an acceptable redraft of this paragraph to meet both the Soviet and United States positions, but we think it would only confuse matters further if we were to attempt to prepare an alternative draft at this distance. We hope, however, that the effort will be continued to reach agreement on a resolution acceptable to and if possible sponsored by the Soviet Union, though retaining the main form and all the substance of your own proposal.

DISARMAMENT — SOVIET AMENDMENTS TO CANADIAN RESOLUTION

After we had had the Soviet amendments to the Canadian resolution translated yesterday evening, I called a meeting with our co-sponsors this morning before the First Committee.

2. The first reactions of Moch and Lloyd were favourable towards accepting most of the Soviet amendments with some changes, since, as Lloyd said, we were gaining our essential points of maintaining the membership of the sub-committee and the timetable as we wished: to secure Soviet support for our procedure would keep Vyshinsky "from fishing in troubled waters" and avoid embarrassing discussions in the committee on Indian membership or (as the Australian and Philippines delegations have proposed) on requiring the sub-committee to make an interim report before the end of the present session. Moch also echoed our point that the Western powers must endeavour (a) to stick together on the Soviet amendments and (b) to avoid giving the appearance of unreasonableness or rigidity.

3. Wadsworth, however, said that it was his understanding that we had all four agreed that we would invite the Soviet Union to co-sponsor the Canadian resolution as it stood. He had thought it was understood there would be no question of negotiating amendments and his present instructions clearly require him to oppose any Soviet amendments. Moreover, even at first glance there were the following points of substance in the Soviet amendments which he did not think the United States could accept:

(a) The concept of "balanced" reduction was basic for the United States as was also the idea of the regulation and limitation of armaments.

(b) The Soviet draft resolution should not even indirectly be given an Assembly blessing and it was dangerous to imply that the Anglo-French and Soviet proposals were so close that they could be taken together as a basis for preparing a convention.

(c) The Soviet omission of a reference in paragraph 2 to "other proposals" was totally unacceptable.

4. Lloyd and Moch agreed that the Soviet amendments could not be accepted as they stood but thought something acceptable to all five delegations could probably be worked out. They did not see how they could refuse the Soviet amendment to paragraph 1 of the Canadian resolution which simply reverted to the wording of the Anglo-French memorandum but they agreed that a reference to "other proposals" was necessary in paragraph 2. The United Kingdom Government would prefer not to give the Soviet proposals equal status with the Anglo-French proposals and the United States could not in any event agree to take the Soviet proposals (even with others) as a basis for an international convention.

5. I adopted a cautious attitude between Wadsworth and the others, having in mind principally the undesirability of encouraging false hopes in France that agreement was just around the corner. At the same time I recognized that in the tactical position in which we now find ourselves it was in our own interests to be reasonable and in any case not to reject the Soviet amendments out of hand. It was agreed that if Vyshinsky put forward his amendments in committee we would all say that we would have to study them.

6. Although he has spoken to the press in general terms about some "small Soviet amendments" Vyshinsky did not speak at this morning's meeting of the First Committee and our next meeting is not until tomorrow (Friday) afternoon. He spoke to me after this morning's meeting and I said that we would need a little time to consider his amendments. He then suggested I show them to the other co-sponsors and I agreed. He told me he had spoken to the press about the amendments and did not press me for an early reply.

7. We shall report in a separate message (No. 238) some of the alternative versions of the Soviet amendments which we discussed at this morning's meeting of the four delegations.

DISARMAMENT — SOVIET AMENDMENTS TO CANADIAN RESOLUTION

1. At a working level meeting of the United States, United Kingdom, French and Canadian delegations this morning, we discussed subject to higher authority in each case, possible compromise wording which Mr. Martin, on behalf of the four co-sponsors, might put to Mr. Vyshinsky on Monday if agreement among our four delegations has been reached by that time.

2. All four delegations agreed there was no difficulty about accepting the Soviet amendment to the title of the resolution.

3. On paragraph 1(a) of the Canadian resolution the United Kingdom, French and Canadian delegations could agree to the Soviet amendment. The United States could agree to the addition of the word "conventional" but could not agree to drop "regulation, limitation and" from our original text. They might, however, be able to agree to drop the word "balanced".

4. On paragraph 1(c) all four delegations are agreed that the Soviet amendment is acceptable, provided, in the case of the United States delegation, that they have a reference to "regulation, limitation" in paragraph 1(a).

5. On paragraph 2, which raises the chief difficulty the United States and French delegations prefer the alternative language reported in paragraph 1(d) of our telegram No. 238.³⁰ The French would, however, change "divergent" to "different". The United Kingdom delegation would probably agree to (d) but prefer (c) since it does not place the Soviet proposals on the same level as the Anglo-French proposals.³¹

³⁰ La variante se lit comme suit :/The alternative text read as follows:

"Requests the Disarmament Commission to seek to reconcile the various divergent proposals which have been put forward and seek to find an acceptable solution of the disarmament problem taking into account the Anglo-French proposals of 11 June, the Soviet proposals of September 30 and other proposals within the Commission's terms of reference."

6. We also discussed the possibility of including in whatever version of this paragraph is acceptable to the co-sponsors a specific reference to the United States proposals covering the rights, functions and powers of the control organ. The United States delegation suggested "taking into account proposals within the Commission's terms of reference including the United States working paper of May 25, the Anglo-French proposals of June 11 and the USSR resolution of October 8". There is something to be said for referring to the United States proposals in some way so that the Soviet delegation, if they agreed to the insertion, cannot later pretend that the Assembly had given a special blessing to the Anglo-French and Soviet proposals.

7. We also agreed that the four delegations should adopt a cautious attitude in commenting to the press on the Soviet amendments, neither rejecting them nor minimizing the points of substance they involve. The four delegations have independently told Hamilton that his report in this morning's New York Times stating that the French had not yet agreed to co-sponsor was incorrect, and a correction will be published tomorrow. A revision of the Canadian resolution was issued last night in the names of the four sponsors.

8. We should be grateful for your instructions by Sunday afternoon, as the next meeting of the four principles may take place Sunday evening, October 17.

DISARMAMENT — SOVIET AMENDMENTS

Our comments on the positions outlined in your telegram under reference are as follows: The paragraph numbers have reference to the paragraph numbers of the Canadian (now four-power) resolution.

Paragraph 1(a) We could agree to the Soviet amendment and hope that it will be possible for the United States not to press for the words "regulation, limitation and"

³¹ La variante (c) se lit comme suit :/Alternative (c) read as follows:

"Requests the Disarmament Commission to seek an acceptable solution of the disarmament problem taking into account the Anglo-French proposals of 11 June, together with the USSR proposals of September 30 and other proposals within the Commission's terms of reference."

in the original text. Failing this we do not see why these words could not be accepted by the USSR if the United States refuses to budge.

Paragraph 1(c) See comment above.

Paragraph 2 We could accept either the text contained in paragraph (c) or (d) of your telegram No. 238 of October 14. Of the two we prefer the text in paragraph (c).

2. However, would it not strengthen the U.S. objective of ensuring that the Soviet proposals are not placed on the same level as the Anglo-French proposals if we were to revert to the language used in the operative paragraph of the original draft sent to us in your 181 of October 8 which used the phrase "on the basis of the Anglo-French proposals" rather than the weakened United States draft "taking into account the Anglo-French proposals". Perhaps a draft on the following lines might be acceptable: "Requests the Disarmament Commission to seek an acceptable solution of the Disarmament problem providing for the conclusion of an international disarmament convention on the basis of the Anglo-French proposals of June 11, 1954, taking into account the USSR resolution of October 8, the United States Working Paper of May 25, and any other proposals within the Commission's terms of reference."

3. We agree with the importance of the point made in your paragraph 7 that the four delegations should adopt a cautious attitude in commenting to the press on the Soviet amendments, neither "rejecting them nor minimizing the points of substance they involve." This is all the more important if subsequently it should become necessary to back away from the Soviet co-sponsorship. One other point which was reflected in our telegram of October 14th on the same subject, is the importance of making it clear that this co-sponsorship of the Soviet resolution is only a procedural step and that it remains to be seen whether they really mean business in the subsequent negotiations. Many people who have not followed the history of these discussions closely may be tempted to think that Soviet co-sponsorship of the resolution may imply a measure of agreement on the substance which is of course not the case.

4. In connection with the foregoing, your attention is drawn to a Canadian Press report by Harcourt in New York which appeared in October 14th Globe and Mail which refers to the fact that "the Soviet action" (i.e. to co-sponsor) "will follow agreement among the other four powers on several comparatively minor Russian amendments to the Canadian resolution". Later in the same text it is stated that "the other three Western powers also were studying Vyshinsky's amendments and the general impression was that the suggested changes would present no difficulties."

DISARMAMENT — SOVIET AMENDMENTS TO FOUR-POWER RESOLUTION

I met again this morning with Lloyd, Moch and Wadsworth to consider which alternatives to the Soviet amendments the four of us could accept. Agreement was reached that I should see Vyshinsky this morning and suggest to him that the sponsors would be willing to put out a re-draft of our resolution, including the USSR as co-sponsor, on the following basis:

- (a) To refer in the title of the resolution to the Soviet item as they proposed;
- (b) To have paragraph 1(A) read: "The regulation, limitation and major reduction of all armed forces and all conventional armaments";
- (c) To accept the Soviet re-draft of paragraph 1(C);
- (d) To amend paragraph 2 as follows:

"Requests the Disarmament Commission to seek to find an acceptable solution of the disarmament problem, taking into account the Anglo-French proposals of 11 June, 1954 (DC/SC.1/10); the draft resolution of the U.S.S.R. of October 8, 1954 (A/C.1/750) providing for the conclusion of an appropriate international convention, to be based on the Anglo-French proposals; the United States working paper of May 25, 1954; and any other proposals with the Commission's terms of reference".

2. During this morning's meeting of the First Committee, I saw Vyshinsky in a private room next door and put the western proposal to him in writing. He said that he would have to consider it and would try to let us know in one or two days. The Soviet amendments were, he said, aimed principally at two points:

- (a) The deletion of the words "regulation, limitation and balanced" from our paragraph 1(A); and
- (b) The inclusion of a reference to the Soviet resolution in our paragraph 2.

3. I pointed out to him that we were agreeing to drop the words "balanced", that the word "regulation" was charter language (Article 26) and that the Soviet delegation had previously not objected to this form of words when it had been used in assembly resolutions (e.g. those of April 8 and November 28, 1953). I added that we had agreed to include a reference to the Soviet resolution in paragraph 2 and that I particularly hoped he would not object to our proposed addition to his amendment which had been worked out after careful thought and consultation.

4. After the First Committee had adjourned, Moch told me that he had been speaking to Vyshinsky and that both Malik and Vyshinsky are recommending to Moscow acceptance of our revised amendments.

DISARMAMENT — VYSHINSKY'S REPLY

Immediately following Selwyn Lloyd's farewell reception this evening, we received a telephone call asking whether I could receive Mr. Vyshinsky tonight. We met at 9 p.m. in Johnson's apartment.

2. Vyshinsky began by regretting the delay in replying to our counter amendments to his amendments to our draft resolution by explaining that consultation with Moscow had taken time. He said that he appreciated the substantial concessions we had made to meet his point of view and accepted our revised version with the exception of paragraph 2. On this he accepted our suggestion of adding "and any other proposals within the Commission's terms of reference". However he could not accept reference to the United States working paper of 25 May, 1954. He also wanted to insert after the words "Anglo-French proposals of June 11, 1954" the phrase "to which the United States agreed".

3. He said that this was meeting us half-way and he hoped that we could accept paragraph 2 reading as follows:

"Requests the Disarmament Commission to seek an acceptable solution of the disarmament problem taking into account the Anglo-French proposals of June 11, 1954 (DC/SC.1/10) to which the United States agreed; the draft resolution of the U.S.S.R. of October 8, 1954 (A/C.1/750) providing for the conclusion of an adequate international convention to be based on the Anglo-French proposals; and any other proposals within the Commission's terms of reference."

4. Vyshinsky made it very clear that his government could not repeat not accept the United States working paper to which, he said, they took exception both in principle and detail. He said there were parts they could accept but they could never, for example, agree to a provision that the control organ would have the right to make aerial surveys.

5. Naturally we pointed out to Vyshinsky that the phrase "taking into account" did not involve a general Assembly blessing as would such language as "based on".

Though we assured ourselves that there was no mistranslation on this point, he insisted that for a sponsor specifically to request that the sub-committee take a certain document into account would involve a high degree of responsibility for that document's contents. It would be "dishonest" for the Soviet Government to give any such blessing to a paper of which they could not accept even half.

6. We pointed out that if specific reference in this paragraph to a document implied approval rather than a mere readiness to consider and discuss, then we would not have been able to accept a reference in this paragraph to the U.S.S.R. draft resolution of 8 October, 1954, with several features of which we and our associates were definitely not in agreement. Vyshinsky insisted that this resolution was in a different position than the American paper because it took the Anglo-French proposals as a basis.

7. We tried out phrases such as "taking into consideration", "noting", "bearing in mind", etc. etc., all to no avail. We also suggested reversion to our original language for paragraph 2, which omits reference to both the Soviet resolution and the American working paper, referring only to the Anglo-French proposals "which have been accepted by the U.S.S.R. as a basis for an international disarmament convention". Vyshinsky could not accept this. As far as his government was concerned, there had to be reference to the Soviet resolution and not to the American control paper.

8. We suggested to Vyshinsky having the paragraph refer to the Anglo-French proposals, the U.S.S.R. draft resolution, and to "working papers or proposals submitted or to be submitted on the functions and powers of a control organ, and any other proposals . . ."; and for a moment or two Vyshinsky and Soblev seemed to hesitate on this but then replied that they could not accept reference to past working papers on this subject as this would refer exclusively to the American document.

9. I then told Vyshinsky that I could not understand the logic of his position. He said he was willing to include reference to "any other proposals within the Commission's terms of reference"; the American working document was unquestionably within the terms of reference, (he agreed), and therefore was covered by this language. Why then could it not be mentioned specifically? Vyshinsky replied that the sponsors could not be held accountable for the contents of "any other proposals" not specifically mentioned.

10. I asked Vyshinsky whether, if his language were accepted, he would agree that the sub-committee could discuss the American working paper on an international control organ. He said that that would be for the Disarmament Commission or sub-committee to decide. When I pressed him, he made it pretty clear that he would vote against such consideration, but implied that he would accept being outvoted.

11. After about an hour and a quarter of arduous exploration to try to find some basis of agreement, we both recognized that nothing more could be done tonight. I undertook to discuss the matter with my co-sponsors, and we both agreed to think things over. On this note Vyshinsky left.

12. Though his office's request for an interview came only after Lloyd's reception at the beginning of the evening, a remark there had given me the impression that Vyshinsky felt he had bad news. As I reported the day before yesterday, Jules Moch told me then that Vyshinsky and Malik had stated to him that they had recommended that Moscow accept our counter proposals. All in all, it seems pretty clear that Vyshinsky has been over-ruled by his government, and it is now unlikely that he can budge.

13. Naturally I am disappointed. Tomorrow morning I shall report the situation frankly to our co-sponsors, the United States, the United Kingdom and France at a meeting which I have called for 9.30. I expect that the Americans will be unable to accept deletion of the reference to their control paper, though Moch will urge it and be restive over the discipline implied in his commitment to co-sponsor.

14. My disposition is to recommend that despite Soviet refusal to co-sponsor, we revise our resolution on the three points which the Soviet Union would accept, and incorporate the compromise language which we have been prepared to accept for the title, paragraphs 1A, 1C and paragraph 2. I might then appeal to Vyshinsky still to reconsider and co-sponsor, and express the hope that if he cannot do this, he will at least be able to vote for our resolution as a whole while making his own delegation's views clear, on the record, about the United States working paper.

15. If we follow this course, I would propose, after the required final discussion with Vyshinsky, to explain to the First Committee, more in sorrow than in anger, the various steps we have taken to meet the Soviet viewpoint in order to satisfy the desire expressed in the Committee for an unanimous resolution. Vyshinsky told me this evening that he did not propose to speak until Friday; we therefore have a day or two to see whether any alternative wording can still be worked out to achieve five-power sponsorship. But it seems to me that the inclusion of the United States working paper is now likely to be a sticking point on both sides. Meanwhile I shall urge on my associates here that we say nothing of this to the press.

16. I had hoped that despite the dangers of creating unwarranted optimism, we could have secured Soviet co-sponsorship on our resolution. We have certainly made every effort to make this possible, first by urging all reasonable concessions and moderation on our associates, and tonight by doing all we could to thrash out with Vyshinsky every line that gave even the slightest appearance of agreement. Our efforts thus far have kept the French delegate in the same camp with the Americans, the British and ourselves, despite a very wide divergence of motives. (Moch told me yesterday in confidence that if Vyshinsky agreed to co-sponsor our resolution as he then confidently expected, Moch would immediately wire Mendes-France urging on him a two months' delay in any steps to debate ratification of France's agreement for German rearmament.) Though we cannot be too confident that Moch will remain with us, nevertheless it seems unlikely that the French Government would concur in a breach with their three co-sponsors now. Moreover the issue on which negotiations with Vyshinsky have broken down is one on which a stand can be taken which will be thoroughly defensible to public opinion in Western Europe as in this hemisphere. For the real difference between the two positions remains essentially the question of control.

DISARMAMENT

At an informal four power meeting this morning I gave Moch, Wadsworth and Selwyn Lloyd an outline of my conversation with Vyshinsky last night. Wadsworth stated that his instructions were not to accept a revision of paragraph 2 which referred specifically to the Soviet proposals and did not include a specific reference to the United States working paper. He said, however, that he would still be agreeable to a formula which did not specify explicitly any of the various proposals.

2. We then, at Moch's suggestions, agreed to try out on Vyshinsky the following compromise text for paragraph 2.

"Requests the Disarmament Commission to seek an acceptable solution of the disarmament problem, taking into account the various proposals referred to in the preamble of this resolution and any other proposals within the Commission's terms of reference."

3. It was decided that I should see Vyshinsky this morning. Bearing in mind his insistence last night on the inclusion of reference to the Soviet proposals, I am not optimistic as to the outcome but I do feel that a refusal by Vyshinsky on this point will leave the onus for the failure of our efforts for five power co-sponsorship on him.

4. As for the future of our resolution, in the event that Vyshinsky does not accept the above suggestion, it was agreed at the meeting that we should table a revised text of our resolution, incorporating those amendments which have been accepted by the Soviet Union and ourselves, leaving paragraph 2 in the form which Vyshinsky refused to accept last night. On behalf of the four western co-sponsors I would give the committee an explanation of these revisions.

DISARMAMENT

The United States Embassy here has shown us a copy of a telegram despatched from Washington to the United States Embassy in Paris in which grave doubts are cast on M. Moch's good faith in the current four-power and five-power negotiations on disarmament.

2. What is objected to is not the fact that M. Moch has taken up different views on particular issues which have arisen over the past week or ten days from those held by the United States, but that he has been not wholly frank with his Western partners in the matter of his own contacts with Vyshinsky. The message makes the point that on a number of occasions M. Moch has clearly had an advance indication of Soviet intentions with respect to the disarmament resolution and that in fact he knew the substance of the Soviet amendments before they had been transmitted to the other Western powers concerned by Mr. Vyshinsky. The implication of the message is therefore that he has been "free wheeling" with respect to the disarmament question and not playing the game entirely according to Hoyle.

3. While the United States Embassy in Paris has not been asked to pass on these doubts and misgivings to the French authorities, they have been asked to ensure that instructions are sent to Moch which would serve to bring his actions at the Assembly more closely in line with what are presumed to be the intentions of the French Government and the concerted policy of the three Western Powers concerned.

4. While we are fully aware of Moch's general attitude to disarmament and his anxiety to seek solutions, we felt it necessary to say that in all the recent public statements which he had made in New York, he had been as critical of the Soviet proposals as anyone else, (reference his "twenty questions" speech), and that we ourselves had had no evidence either that he was not acting in good faith or that his contacts with the Soviet Delegation in New York were out of the ordinary given his intense interest in this subject.

5. We are not required and we do not intend to take any action. For our own information, however, we should welcome any comments which you might wish to make on the basis of your experience of negotiations with M. Moch. Needless to say, the United States approach to us in this matter should not repeat not be discussed with any other delegation.

DISARMAMENT

Following from Holmes: In the absence of the Minister and temporarily of the Under-Secretary the following are the views of the Officers concerned:³²

2. It would seem that if Vyshinsky rejects the compromise text given in para. 2 of your No. 290, every possibility of reaching agreement with the Russians on the question of co-sponsorship will have been explored to no avail and, as you suggest, the onus of the failure will be on the U.S.S.R.

3. In these circumstances we think the procedure outlined in para. 14 of your 285 and para 4 of your 290 is a good one. This should enable it to be emphasized with advantage that Canada is, as always, ready to make every effort to reach mutually acceptable compromises with the U.S.S.R. on the disarmament question. At the same time the narrowing of the differences to the one outstanding point on which agreement cannot be reached, should afford an opportunity of focussing public attention on the fact that this point, which may seem small in relation to our procedural resolution, is in reality of the utmost basic importance to the fundamental disarmament problem since it concerns the question of control. We believe that it is difficult to over emphasize that the Soviet wariness in this respect seems to underline their continued reluctance to accept the kind of authoritative and workable control system which the Western countries are prepared to accept as the only practicable means of insuring the success of any disarmament scheme.

4. It would seem desirable to make a special effort to make this clear to Menon whose proposed amendments, which will presumably now be submitted, may tend to minimize the full import of the Soviet intransigence on the question of control.

5. Disappointing as it will be if Vyshinsky cannot co-sponsor the Canadian resolution, there is some consolation in the knowledge that you have reached a sound position, from the West's point of view, on which to break off the negotiations with him. In any case, if Moch's intention is to consider the comparatively unimportant question of co-sponsorship of our procedural resolution as somehow being a significant approach towards agreement on disarmament and accordingly to urge his Government to relate Five Power sponsorship to the extraneous question of French ratification of the agreements on German rearmament, it may be fortuitous that Soviet co-sponsorship is unobtainable. While it is hard to believe that the French Government would agree to any proposal of this kind along the lines of para. 16 of your message No. 285, it would be unfortunate if a strong plea from Moch should muddy the waters and increase the hesitancy that impedes French ratification. In addition, you will have noted from our telegram No. 163 that the personal position of Moch is itself cause for some anxiety. As you know our fundamental purpose is to maintain Western unity on disarmament and we would hope that whatever Vyshinsky may do with respect to co-sponsoring our resolution will not have the effect of further weakening the bond between Moch's viewpoint and that of the other Western representatives.

5. Our message No. 163 has been repeated to the Minister in Paris, and he has also been sent a summary of this telegram and your Nos. 285 and 290.

DISARMAMENT — VYSHINSKY AGAIN

After this morning's meeting of the First Committee I saw Vyshinsky again, this time in the offices of the Soviet delegation, and put to him the alternative wording of paragraph 2 which had been worked out this morning among the four western co-sponsors. I impressed upon him that it had taken a considerable effort to arrive at this counter-proposal and I urged him to let us know if possible today whether he could accept it and agree to co-sponsor the revised resolution.

2. Vyshinsky saw at once that the final paragraph of the preamble would then define the proposals which the Disarmament Commission and the sub-committee would have to take into account. He made the personal suggestion that the following words might be added to this final paragraph of the preamble "to be based on the Anglo-French proposals of June 11". But when I hesitated he said he did not think he should press his suggestion, at least "not yet".

3. You may well wonder why I hesitated. This was an act on my part. After our meeting this morning with the other three, I was having coffee with Wadsworth and I said to him that in the revised draft (which I was shortly to be showing Mr.

Vyshinsky) we had not mentioned the Anglo-French proposal. This, at first, disturbed him, as it did me. On reflection we both realized, however, that in the Soviet resolution reference is made to the desirability of "a convention on the basis of the French and United Kingdom proposals of June 11". The result is of course that, if Mr. Vyshinsky accepts our latest draft, there would be no going back on the Anglo-French memorandum as a basis for discussion. Later I talked to Lloyd about our failure to mention the Anglo-French memorandum specifically. He was not upset though I have reason to believe his advisers do not share his view.

4. I thought if I acceded too readily to Mr. Vyshinsky's suggestion I would be without any bargaining position whatsoever. I indicated that the draft which I had presented to him was not easily arrived at and if he was going to keep on making suggestions he would make our position difficult. I think he understood and I hope he believed me.

5. As you may imagine, I was therefore really pleased when he suggested we should add the words "to be based on the Anglo-French proposals of June 11". After I saw Vyshinsky I sought out Wadsworth. He was enthusiastic and said of course we must accept this suggestion. The French agreed too, so Moch told me as I hurriedly descended the escalator to get away from this madness.

6. Vyshinsky said he would "telephone Moscow" and try to let me have a reply this evening at the Ukrainian delegation reception. I remarked that at the end of our conversation yesterday evening I had not had much hope of five power sponsorship, but now had more. Vyshinsky replied that he had hopes but was not "full of hope". However, I have the impression that he will try to secure his government's agreement to co-sponsor on the basis of our further revision of paragraph 2 which avoids the problem of mentioning specifically the United States working paper by referring to the preambular reference to the disarmament sub-committee's report (including both the Anglo-French and the United States papers) and the Soviet resolution of October 8.

6. A few minutes after we had advised our three associates of Vyshinsky's reaction, Hamilton of the New York Times had the full story of developments last night and this morning — not, I may say, from us.

7. Since it seems to be impossible to keep any of these negotiations from the press and in view of the New York Times editorial this morning which criticizes the United States delegation for being too conciliatory in the disarmament negotiations, I think the sooner matters are brought to a head and fully explained the better. I hope, therefore, if I hear from Vyshinsky this evening, to speak in the First Committee tomorrow morning and to announce either Soviet co-sponsorship of our revised text or the reasons why their co-sponsorship could not be obtained. At the same time, of course in consultation with our co-sponsors, I think we should bring out a revision of our draft resolution incorporating what we can of the Soviet amendments as agreed among the four delegations this morning (our telegram No. 290).

DISARMAMENT

Please pass the following message to the Honourable Paul Martin from the Minister, Begins: I have been reading with great interest telegrams regarding your untiring efforts to arrange for Soviet co-sponsorship of the disarmament resolution.

2. It would have been unfortunate if Russia had been given no opportunity for such co-sponsorship, but I would not myself worry if after the effort has been made she is not able to join the other four, and I do not think that the effort should be continued to a point where it would cause trouble between us and the United States. I am strengthened in this view by the information that Moch might counsel delay in Paris on ratification of the London agreements if the Soviets sponsor our disarmament resolution.

3. I think that you have done everything you possibly could, and that if the effort should now fail, you have no reason for either reproach or discouragement. My original worry was not so much that Russia was not a co-sponsor as that she might complain that no opportunity had been given to her to participate with the others in this resolution. Ends.

Reference: Your telegram No. 168 of October 21.

Please pass the following message immediately to Mr. Pearson in Paris from Mr. Martin, Begins: Thank you for your thoughtful telegram of the 21 of October which I greatly appreciate. We too have had the feeling during the past two days that quite sufficient effort has been made to obtain Soviet co-sponsorship.

2. We do not yet know whether they will decide to co-sponsor or not, but we will not be unhappy either way. The important thing has been to make all reasonable efforts to allow them to join in co-sponsoring our essentially procedural resolution because that course seemed intrinsically right. It also seemed best calculated to maintain French-American unity in this field and to obtain or retain the sympathetic support of world opinion for the Western stand on the disarmament problem.

3. If Russia does decide to co-sponsor, we will of course take steps in our statement to show the situation in perspective and to emphasize that facile over-optimism would be fatuous and could be dangerous. If, on the other hand, the Soviet Union refuses to co-sponsor despite our considerable efforts, then the issue between us and text of the resolution will have been narrowed and pointed up, focussing on the all-important question of control.

4. Incidentally, I would not wish you to think that we have, during the past few days, had to put pressure on the Americans. This was the case on October 14, when the State Department instructions were against even considering any Soviet suggestions for revision of our resolution. The rather strong line we took then seemed necessary to prevent an open United States-French break. Since that date, however, the Americans have seen considerable advantage in being conciliatory, and have at times been prepared to go somewhat further than has seemed to us wise. For example, in paragraph two of our draft resolution, the Americans, British and French were at first prepared to have us offer Vyshinsky a wording which would instruct the Disarmament Commission to take into account specifically the Anglo-French memorandum, the Soviet resolution "and other proposals", without any specific reference to the United States Working Paper on control machinery. It was at Canada's suggestion that reference to this United States paper was included. This matter of giving the same reference in paragraph two to the United States Working Paper as to the Soviet resolution has so far proved the sticking point with the USSR, but all our co-sponsors are in the event satisfied that the four of us have been right to insist on this point, and that if it proves the issue on which our co-sponsorship efforts toward the Soviet Union fail, then the Western position will be readily defensible and will be supported by the overwhelming majority of the assembly.

5. All in all, this has proven a very interesting exercise. Incidentally, one of the benefits it has yielded has been to bring about extremely close and confident relations between the United States delegation and our own — closer than has previously existed since the Republican administration has taken over. All of us have formed the highest opinion of Jerry Wadsworth. As far as we can see there is significantly more divergence between Pentagon thinking and that of the United States delegation here, than between the United States and Canadian delegations.

6. I hope I have not fumbled, but I do want you to know how much I appreciate and value what David, Arnold and Jim George have done. Personal regards. Ends.

DISARMAMENT

Following for the Minister from Under-Secretary, Begins: My immediately following telegram repeats the text of telegram No. 290 from the Delegation in New York indicating that agreement had been reached by the four powers to try out on Vyshinsky the compromise text set forth in paragraph two of the Delegation's telegram No. 290 of October 20.

2. We have just heard by telephone from New York that M. Moch had informed our Delegation that Vyshinsky had agreed to this compromise text. This now removes the last basis of difficulty so far as five-power co-sponsorship is concerned, and in view of the importance that will be attributed to the Soviet agreement, it is likely that the Soviet Delegation will take early action, possibly today, to make its concurrence known.

3. This raises the question for our side of seeing to it that this co-sponsorship by the Soviet Union is placed quickly and carefully in its proper context. Mr. Martin is present today in London, Ontario where he is receiving an honorary degree, and we have been in touch with him. His view, which is strongly supported by the United States and the United Kingdom Delegations in New York, is that Mr. Johnson should be prepared in the Assembly to speak on behalf of the Western powers if this subject comes up this afternoon, and we are proceeding on these lines.

4. As you well know, we have been careful to emphasize throughout this exercise the importance of ensuring that the importance of Soviet co-sponsorship is not over-played. The Delegation, therefore, will do its best to try to make clear that what is now involved is merely agreement on the terms of a procedural resolution to study the problem of disarmament in the Sub-committee and that this procedural step should not be confused with agreement on any substantial disarmament programme, the possibility of which can only be determined by future developments and by a further detailed exploration of Soviet intentions.

5. We do not dismiss the possibility that M. Moch will see more in Soviet co-sponsorship than the facts justify, and for this reason in the event that you may be called upon in Paris to comment on the significance of Soviet co-sponsorship of the four-power resolution, you will no doubt wish to take what steps are open to make the position clear.

DISARMAMENT

Following is text of five power resolution tabled this afternoon as Document A/C.1/752/REV.2. Text Begins:

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming the responsibility of the United Nations for seeking a solution of the disarmament problem,

Conscious that the continuing development of armaments increases the urgency of the need for such a solution,

Having considered the fourth report of the Disarmament Commission of 29 July 1954 (DC/53 and DC/55), and the documents annexed thereto, and the Soviet draft resolution (A/C.1/750) concerning the conclusion of an international convention (treaty) on the reduction of armaments and the prohibition of atomic, hydrogen, and other weapons of mass destruction,

1. Concludes that a further effort should be made to reach agreement on comprehensive and co-ordinated proposals to be embodied in a draft international disarmament convention providing for:

(a) The regulation, limitation and major reduction of all armed forces and all conventional armaments;

(b) The total prohibition of the use and manufacture of nuclear weapons and weapons of mass destruction of every type, together with the conversion of existing stocks of nuclear weapons for peaceful purposes;

(c) The establishment of effective international control, through a control organ with rights, powers and functions adequate to guarantee the effective observance of the agreed reductions of all armaments and armed forces and the prohibition of nuclear and other weapons of mass destruction, and to ensure the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes only;

The whole programme to be such that no state would have cause to fear that its security was endangered;

2. Requests the Disarmament Commission to seek an acceptable solution of the disarmament problem, taking into account the various proposals referred to in the preamble of this resolution and any other proposals within the commission's terms of reference;

3. Suggests that the Disarmament Commission reconvene the sub-committee established in accordance with paragraphs 6 and 7 of General Assembly resolution 715 (VIII);

4. Requests the Disarmament Commission to report to the Security Council and to the General Assembly as soon as sufficient progress has been made.³³ Text Ends.

PRESIDENT EISENHOWER'S PROPOSALS ON ATOMIC ENERGY

The Advisory Panel on Atomic Energy* met on January 5, 1954, to explore the implications for Canada of President Eisenhower's proposal that a new international agency to further the peaceful uses of atomic energy and related material should be established,³⁴ and to prepare for your consideration some suggestions as to action and policy which might be followed by representatives of the Canadian Government during the next few months, when methods of implementing the proposals are being discussed between the countries concerned.

* The membership of the Advisory Panel on Atomic Energy is as follows:

The Secretary to the Cabinet (Chairman)
The President, Atomic Energy Control Board
The Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs
The Chairman, Defence Research Board
The President, Atomic Energy of Canada, Limited
Mr. G.C. Bateman

Also present at the meeting of January 5, 1954, were the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, and the Canadian Ambassador to the United States.

³³ La résolution a été adoptée à l'unanimité par l'Assemblée générale le 4 novembre 1954.

The resolution was adopted by the General Assembly on November 4, 1954 in a unanimous vote.

³⁴ Voir/See United States, Department of State, American Foreign Policy, 1950-1955, Basic Documents, Volume II, Washington: Department of State, 1957, pp. 2798-2805.

2. In preparing this report the Panel took into account the information contained in the attached telegrams[†] dated December 16, December 24 and December 30, 1953, from our Ambassador in Washington. These telegrams, in addition to giving useful information on current American ideas on the implementation of the plan, also point out that United States officials would welcome any Canadian suggestions, particularly in the immediate future while their own views were still fluid. The Panel also noted the attached telegram dated January 4, 1954,[†] from our High Commissioner in London, which indicated that the United Kingdom authorities are only just getting around to a serious study of the problem.

3. In view of the public statements made by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Defence Production immediately after the President's speech of December 8, and because of the coincidence of the Eisenhower proposals with the general aims of Canadian policy, the Panel has assumed that the Canadian Government will wish to support the United States Government in their endeavour.

4. After careful consideration of President Eisenhower's plan, and the factors, so far as they are known at present, which might be expected to affect Canadian participation in it, the Panel believes that the Government might proceed as follows:

(a) that the Canadian Government should endorse the general idea of an international agency to facilitate the development of the peacetime uses of atomic energy, as suggested by President Eisenhower in his speech of December 8, 1953, to the United Nations General Assembly, and in doing so should accept the implicit obligation to make contributions to the agency on a basis to be negotiated when the requirements are known;

(b) that the Secretary of State for External Affairs should be authorized to instruct the Canadian Ambassador in Washington and the High Commissioner in London to inform the United States and United Kingdom authorities of this fact and of the views outlined in the following sub-paragraphs;

(c) that it would seem desirable for the proposed international agency to be associated with the United Nations, probably as a "specialized agency"; (It will be important, however, to insure that in determining its policies and programme, the views of the important contributing powers have appropriate weight. One way of accomplishing this would be to follow the precedent set when the International Monetary Fund was established and include some system of weighted voting. Another method might be to have an executive council composed of permanent members representing the important contributing nations, and elected members representing the other countries.)

(d) that the following suggestions regarding the scope and nature of the proposed agency be given to the United States and United Kingdom authorities for their consideration:

(i) The agency should secure uranium and fissionable material from countries supporting and contributing to it; should itself hold only small stocks of such material, but be in a position to draw upon the stocks held by contributing nations up to the amounts pledged. Such stocks held for it by contributing countries would be segregated and subject to its inspection.

(ii) The agency should supply on a rental or sale basis, but subject to its continued inspection and control, uranium and fissionable materials for the establishment of power and research reactors by countries willing and able to establish and operate such reactors with the help of the agency.

(iii) The agency should be given the duty, in addition to furnishing of materials, of arranging for the provision of professional and technical services in the construction and initial operation of power and research reactors to those countries capable of making effective use of such services.

(iv) The agency should, in due course, in co-operation with other agencies assisting in the development of under-developed countries, make available atomic materials and technical assistance for the building of atomic power plants in under-developed countries, when the technology of such plants has advanced to the stage where this is practical.

(v) The agency should be enabled to finance the sale on credit or rental of uranium and fissionable materials provided to recipient countries as described, but should not provide other capital required for the construction of reactors, leaving this role to the recipient nation itself or to other institutions, including the International Bank and any agencies engaged in assisting economic development of other types. Payment by recipient nations might be in materials of use to the Agency in lieu of money.

(vi) The Agency should not itself construct, own or operate atomic reactors, but might conceivably undertake certain key processing work if this contributed to the more effective control of fissionable materials furnished to recipient nations.

(e) that it is important for a clear understanding to be reached between those likely to be the principal contributing powers (other than Russia) before getting involved in discussions with other countries or in the Disarmament Commission; for this reason it would be desirable for informal discussions to commence forthwith between the countries represented on the Combined Policy Committee that deals with atomic energy matters (i.e., the United States, United Kingdom and Canada); in any event, Canada, as an important potential contributor, would wish to be consulted before any firm proposals were put forward to countries other than those represented on the Combined Policy Committee.³⁵

I thought it might be useful, prior to your departure on your trip around the world,³⁶ if I gave you a brief report on the developments since President Eisenhower made his proposals on atomic energy to the General Assembly of the United Nations last December. A copy of this memorandum is included in the handbook which is being prepared for your use en route.

2. You will recall that the Advisory Panel on Atomic Energy recommended certain actions and policies which might be followed by representatives of the Canadian Government during the next few months when methods of implementing President Eisenhower's proposals are being discussed between the countries concerned. A summary of the Panel's proposals regarding the nature of the proposed international agency to administer the plan is attached as Appendix "A".†

3. As a consequence of your approval of the report, our High Commissioner in London and our Ambassador in Washington were instructed to inform the United Kingdom and United States Governments of the Canadian suggestions. In addition, they were directed to state that in the view of the Canadian Government it was important for a clear understanding to be reached between those likely to be the principal contributing powers (other than Russia) before getting involved in discussions with other countries or in the Disarmament Commission; for this reason, Canada as an important potential contributor, would wish to be consulted before any firm proposals were put forward to countries other than those represented on the Combined Policy Committee (i.e. the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada).

4. Subsequently the French Embassy in Ottawa was advised informally of the nature of the Canadian views regarding the possible form of the proposed international agency, but was not informed of Canadian views regarding procedure for the negotiations.

5. Just before he left for the Conference of Foreign Ministers, Mr. Dulles had two meetings with Zaroubin, the Soviet Ambassador in Washington. In the course of these meetings Zaroubin indicated Russian agreement with the U.S. view that diplomatic channels be employed to begin with for confidential consultations, it being understood that subsequently discussions might be moved to the Disarmament Commission. Zaroubin added that the necessity for bringing other representatives into the consultations could be considered later, affirming that such others should be those who had "the principal responsibility for peace and security". The Americans wonder whether this means Communist China.

6. The Soviet Union consented to consideration of President Eisenhower's proposals and the undertaking of negotiations thereon; at the same time the reply stated that the Soviet Government considered it necessary to negotiate simultaneously on the Soviet proposals, that is to say by "rotation". Zaroubin explained this as indicating a meeting one day on the President's proposals, the next meeting the next day on the Soviet proposals, and so on.

7. The U.S. is now contemplating an exchange of memoranda between Dulles and Molotov toward the end of the Berlin meeting.³⁷ The U.S. memorandum, which would be concerned with the substance of the President's proposals, would be cleared in advance with the United Kingdom and Canada, "probably" with France, and "possibly" with Belgium and South Africa.

8. Both my Department and the U.K. Foreign Office have doubts regarding the U.S. proposal that the discussion of substance with the Russians might in the first instance be pursued through diplomatic channels, and Eden has spoken to Dulles about this at Berlin. Although Dulles reiterated his strong preference for the diplomatic channel, the Foreign Office does not appear to be unduly concerned over the way things are developing, and are assuming that some satisfactory arrangements will be worked out by the time the memorandum on substance is ready for presentation to Molotov.

9. It is probable that matters may develop rapidly in the next two or three weeks. In the event that anything arises which it would be helpful for you to be informed about while you are in Europe I will arrange to have a report sent to you.

PRESIDENT EISENHOWER'S PROPOSALS ON ATOMIC ENERGY

We were given this morning the proposed text of the memorandum to be handed by the Acting Secretary of State to the Soviet Ambassador here. The text is in my immediately following teletype.

³⁷ Voir/See United States, Department of State, Bulletin, Vol. XXXI, No. 797, October 4, 1954, pp. 478-489.

2. The Acting Secretary hopes to deliver this memorandum at the end of this week. If, however, it is impossible for you to reply in time for that, he would consider delaying until early next week. It was, however, indicated to us that any comments expressed would be welcomed more in relation to subsequent negotiations and plans than as amendments of this text.

3. This memorandum has been handed to the United Kingdom Embassy here; it will be handed to the French Embassy today; and will shortly be handed to the South Africans, Australians, and Belgians.

4. It is still intended that negotiations be diplomatic and bilateral. You will note in paragraph III(A)(2) that only the United States and the Soviet Union are mentioned. The State Department have still no defined plan for procedure of negotiations subsequent to their discussions with the Russians.

5. As to the document itself, you will note that it is proposed that the agency is to be set up by treaty and is not to be under the authority of the United Nations. This means that membership would not be confined to members of the United Nations and that there is nothing in the document to prevent Communist China from becoming a member of the Governing Body. This is fully realized by the United States authorities, who believe that if the Soviet Union wish to emphasize the position of Communist China, they will do so, whatever the form of the proposal.

6. With reference to III(B)(2), Arneson said that the word "initially" meant that any material supplied by the agency would remain the property of the agency, but any fissionable material produced by a reactor might become the property of the recipient nation.

PRESIDENT EISENHOWER'S PROPOSALS ON ATOMIC ENERGY

The following is the memorandum referred to, Begins:

OUTLINE OF AN INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY

The United States Government wishes to submit additional tentative views amplifying the proposals for an International Atomic Energy Agency as presented by the President of the United States to the United Nations General Assembly on December 8, 1953.

I. The Objectives of the United States Proposals

The United States proposes that there should be established under the aegis of the United Nations an International Atomic Energy Agency to receive supplies of nuclear materials from participating countries with stocks of such materials to be used for the following objectives:

A. To encourage world-wide research and development of peaceful uses of atomic energy by assuring that engineers and scientists of the world have sufficient materials to conduct such activities

B. To furnish nuclear materials to meet the needs of agriculture, medicine, and other peaceful activities including the eventual production of power.

II. The International Atomic Energy Agency

A. The Agency would be created by and derive its authority under the terms of a treaty among the participating nations. To the greatest extent practicable, the treaty should define standards and principles which would govern the Agency in the discharge of its functions.

B. Membership — all signatory states would be members of the Agency.

C. Governing body.

1. The highest executive authority in the Agency should be exercised by a Board of Governors, of limited membership representing governments. In determining the composition of the Board of Governors, it might be desirable to take account of geographic distribution and membership by prospective beneficiaries. It is expected that the principal contributors would be on the Board of Governors.

2. It is suggested that decisions of the Board of Governors generally should be taken by some form of majority vote. Arrangements could be worked out to give the principal contributing countries special voting privileges on certain matters, such as allocations of fissionable material.

D. Staff — the staff of the Agency should be headed by an Administrative Head or General Manager, appointed for a fixed term by the Board of Governors and subject to its control, and, of course, include highly qualified scientific and technical personnel. Under the general supervision of the Board, the Administrative Head should be responsible for the appointment, organization and functioning of the staff.

E. Financing

1. Funds for the central facilities and fixed plant of the Agency and its research projects should be provided through appropriation by the participating states in accordance with a scale of contributions to be agreed upon. It is suggested that it might be possible to utilize the general principles governing the scale of contributions by individual members to the United Nations.

2. Funds for specific projects submitted by member nations to utilize the materials or services of the Agency should be provided by the recipient country concerned through specific arrangements in each case.

F. The Administrative Headquarters of the Agency could be located at a place mutually agreed upon, such as at the seat of the United Nations or Geneva.

G. Relationship to the United Nations and other international bodies — since operations of the Agency may affect the maintenance of international peace and security the Agency should report periodically to the United Nations Security Council and GA, and should report specially as requested by either of these United Nations organs. Necessary action in the Security Council or GA should be decided in accordance with their own voting procedures. The Agency should also consult and cooperate with other United Nations bodies whose work may be related to that of the Agency.

H. The facilities of the Agency would include:

1. Plant, equipment, and facilities for the receipt, storage, and issuance of nuclear materials.
2. Physical safeguards.
3. Control laboratories for analysis and verification of receipts and inventory control of nuclear materials.
4. Necessary housing for administrative and other activities of the Agency not included in the preceding categories.
5. Those facilities, as might in time be necessary, for such purposes as education and training, research and development, fuel fabrication and chemical processing.

III. Functions of the Agency

A. Receipt and storage of materials.

1. All member nations possessing stocks of normal and enriched uranium, thorium metal, U-233, U-235, U-238, plutonium and alloys of the foregoing would be expected to make contributions of such material to the Agency.

2. The United States would be prepared to make as a donation, a substantial initial contribution of nuclear material towards the needs of the Agency. The USSR would make an equivalent donation towards these needs.

3. The Agency would specify the place, method of delivery, and when appropriate, the form and composition of materials it will receive. The Agency would also verify stated quantities of material received and would report to the members these amounts. The Agency would be responsible for storing and protecting materials in a way to minimize the likelihood of surprise seizure.

B. Allocation of materials by the Agency.

1. The Agency would review proposals submitted by participating members desiring to receive allocations of Agency stocks in the light of uniform and equitable criteria, including:

- a. The use to which material would be put, including scientific and technical feasibility.
- b. The adequacy of plans, funds, technical personnel, etc., to assure effective use of the material.
- c. Adequacy of proposed health and safety measures for handling and storing materials and for operating facilities.
- d. Equitable distribution of available materials.

2. Title to nuclear materials would initially remain with the Agency, which would determine fair payment to be made for use of materials.

3. In order to insure that adequate health and safety standards were being followed, and in order to assure that allocated fissionable material is being used for the purposes for which it was allocated, the Agency would have the continuing authority to prescribe certain design and operating conditions, health and safety regulations, require accountability and operating records, specify disposition of by-product fissionable materials and wastes, retain the right of monitoring, and require progress reports. The Agency would also have authority to verify status of allocated material inventories and to verify compliance with the terms of issuance.

4. Information about all transactions entered into by the Agency would be available to all members.

C. Information and service activities of the Agency.

1. All member nations possessing information relevant to the activities of the Agency would be expected to make contributions from that information to the Agency.

2. In addition to data developed as a result of its own activities, the Agency would have available:

a. Data developed by participating countries as a result of the utilization of the materials, information, services, and other assistance of the Agency.

b. Data already publicly available in some of the countries.

c. Data developed and previously held by principals or other members and voluntarily contributed to the Agency.

3. The Agency would encourage the exchange of scientific and technical information among nations, and be responsible for making wide dissemination of the data in its possession.

4. The Agency would serve as an intermediary securing the performance of services by one participating country for another. Among the specific activities the Agency might provide would be the following:

a. Training and education.

b. Services concerned with developing codes for public health and safety in connection with the utilization of fissionable materials.

c. Consultative technical services in connection with the establishment and carrying on of programs.

d. Processing of nuclear materials (i.e., chemical separation and purification, fabrication of fuel elements, etc).

e. Supply of special materials, such as heavy water.

f. Design and supply of specialized equipment.

g. Special laboratory services such as conduct of experiments and tests.

h. Aid in making financial arrangements for the support of appropriate projects.

Ends.

PRESIDENT EISENHOWER'S PROPOSALS ON ATOMIC ENERGY

Following from the Minister: Unless after consultation with Makins you wish to propose other action, I think you might speak to the State Department along the following lines:

1. The timetable suggested by the State Department would seem to preclude full and effective discussion of the text of the memorandum, particularly in view of the statement in paragraph 2 of your telegram that "any comments expressed would be welcomed more in relation to subsequent negotiations and plans than as amendments of this text". We gave the State Department our suggestions on the implementation of the proposal nearly two months ago and since that time have repeatedly asked for information on U.S. views and for an opportunity to consider and discuss them prior to their presentation to the Russians. Mr. Dulles' aide-mémoire to Mr. Eden, in which he said that the memorandum would be given to the Russians only after the prior concurrence of the U.K., Canada and France as to the essential lines of the plan, reinforced our understanding that there would be an opportunity for consultation in advance. We do not regard the procedure proposed by the State Department as even approximating this understanding. However, we will endeavour to give Canadian views by the time requested.

2. In the meantime we would appreciate being informed of the considerations which led the United States to conclude that the Agency should itself hold the stocks of fissile materials "in a way to minimize the likelihood of surprise seizure" rather than having the donor countries hold the fissile material on behalf of the Agency as we suggested. It seems to us that this feature of the U.S. plan creates a number of problems that our scheme avoided. In discussing this point, you might at the same time seek to obtain U.S. comments on the other aspects of the Canadian plan, particularly where they differ from U.S. views.

DRAFT U.S. MEMORANDUM ON PRESIDENT EISENHOWER'S PROPOSALS ON ATOMIC ENERGY

1. The Advisory Panel on Atomic Energy has made the following observations on the text of the U.S. memorandum as given in your WA-329.³⁸ You may transmit them to the State Department as the comments of the Canadian Government.

2. The Canadian Government is in agreement with the general lines of the U.S. memorandum but wishes to make the following comments which can be taken into account in subsequent negotiations if the U.S. Government is not prepared to consider revision of the current memorandum. It is desired to emphasize the view of the Canadian Government that it is difficult to comment constructively on a complex memorandum of this nature without having had a prior opportunity to discuss the text with the appropriate U.S. officials in order to appreciate the intentions of the drafters of the document. The Canadian Government wishes to re-affirm its belief that the Combined Policy Committee would provide a useful forum for such exploratory discussions.

General Observations

3. In our view, possibly the most significant and valuable parts of the whole memorandum are those in Sections III C-3 and III C-4 a-h. If the memorandum could be recast to enhance the importance of these proposals we believe it would be greatly strengthened.

4. As stated in our comments of January 6, 1954, we remain of the opinion that the Agency could best accomplish its purpose if it operated primarily as a "broker" rather than as a "banker", as the U.S. memorandum seems to envisage. It seems to us that the U.S. proposal makes necessary a more complicated organization with a much larger staff — and budget — than we believe is desirable, and raises the ³⁸ Le mémoire a été remis à Zaroubin par Dulles, le 19 mars 1954, à Washington. À l'exception de quelques changements mineurs, le texte qui a été présenté au Canada était identique à la version finale présentée au représentant de l'Union soviétique. Pour le texte intégral du mémoire, voir: The memorandum was handed to Zaroubin by Dulles on March 19, 1954 in Washington. With the exception of a few small changes, the draft which was presented to Canada was identical to the final version submitted to the Soviet representative. difficult problem of how and where the Agency is going to hold its stocks of fissile materials "to minimize the likelihood of surprise seizure".

Objectives

5. The objectives outlined in the memorandum seem, in emphasis at least, to differ from our understanding of the original proposals, by accentuating the provision of materials and ignoring the most important ingredient, "knowledge" (our comment in paragraph 3 above refers). In addition, objective B seems to relegate atomic power to the background by lumping it in with a number of other uses apparently connected with radioactive isotopes, which, of course, are already being freely circulated to the rest of the world.

International Atomic Energy Agency

6. We assume from Article II(G) of the United States memorandum that it is intended that the Agency should be a specialized Agency of the United Nations. We entirely concur in this approach since it would provide for close integration of the Agency with the United Nations, which we consider essential, and at the same time enable all present and prospective contributors of nuclear materials to participate in the work of the Agency whether or not they are members of the United Nations. As a Specialized Agency, it would presumably be brought into relationship with the United Nations by means of an agreement between the Agency and the United Nations in accordance with Article 63 of the Charter. The Agency would, nevertheless, have an independent status separate from the United Nations.

7. We are in general agreement with the outline of the Agency contained in Article II of the memorandum (although as stated in paragraph 4 above it would appear that the United States Government has in mind a more complicated organization and larger staff than we had thought would be desirable). Paragraph (C) of Article II would seem to protect the interests of the main contributors. This paragraph, as well as paragraphs (D), (E) and (F) of Article II, seems sufficiently broad in scope to serve as an adequate basis for negotiation.

8. In view of the importance which attaches to a close association of the Agency with the United Nations, it is suggested that the link between the two organizations should be more clearly emphasized in the memorandum. Specific reference to Article 55 of the Charter, which sets out the United Nations purposes in economic, social, cultural and educational matters, could usefully be made in the declaration of objectives and purposes of the Agency. Reference might also be made to other relevant Articles of Chapters IX and X of the Charter, e.g. Articles 57 and 59 and 60 which would serve to establish in a clear manner the relationship of the Agency to the United Nations.

9. In this connection, it is noted that in Article II (G) of the Memorandum the proposal is made that the new agency should report periodically to the Security Council and the General Assembly. While there are clearly security implications in the work of the proposed agency, it will be borne in mind that Specialized Agencies normally report to the General Assembly through ECOSOC, which would also have an interest in this case in view of the fact that the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes would conform to the economic and social objectives of the Charter. The agreement defining the relationship of the new agency to the United Nations could contain such provisions as are appropriate regarding the agency on the one hand and the General Assembly, the Security Council and ECOSOC on the other. End of comments.

10. United Kingdom authorities in London and Washington may be informed of these views. Ends.

PRESIDENT EISENHOWER'S PROPOSALS ON ATOMIC ENERGY

Yesterday Arneson telephoned that he was ready to discuss the United States views on the comments which we had made in our memorandum dated March 11. He indicated that there was no pressing hurry but we made an appointment at the first time convenient to him, which was this afternoon.

2. Just before leaving the Embassy we saw the AP ticker showing that the United States memorandum had already been handed to Zaroubin. We are sending two following telegrams as follows:

(a) Revisions made in the United States memorandum to meet our suggestions and those of the United Kingdom;

(b) State Department press release No. 148 of March 19, 1954.³⁹

3. We had a short conversation with Arneson and Wainhouse (who was called in by Arneson to explain the United Nations aspect of the matter). This United Nations aspect, in fact, boiled down to an explanation somewhat as follows: The United States considered a specialized agency but rejected the idea in order to avoid the delay involved in reporting through the Economic and Social Council. It is clear, however, I think from the paragraph as presently drafted that the relationship to the United Nations is general enough to allow for changes as a result of negotiations.

4. We thought that we should take the opportunity now that the memorandum had been presented to the Soviet Ambassador to enquire as to the methods by which the United States consider that subsequent negotiations would be conducted ³⁹ Pour le texte intégral du communiqué, voir/For the full text of the press release, see United States, Department of State, Bulletin, Vol. XXX, No. 770, March 29, 1954, p. 465.

(a) Between the western powers concerned, and

(b) With the Soviet Union.

Arneson said, as he has before, that they have not yet appointed an individual who will be the negotiator and intimated that until this was done, discussions with Canada and other western powers would be deferred. I then expressed as a personal and tentative view that it would be advantageous to make arrangements at an early date for what, I suggested, might be quite complicated discussions on the exact form of the agency, its functions, and relationship to the United Nations. There was some tendency to suggest in reply that the Soviet answer might be such as to make further negotiations with the Soviet Union difficult. They might, for example, well relate the President's proposals to disarmament. I continued to suggest, however, that particularly in view of the fact that it was not clear whether or not the Eisenhower proposal would be pursued even without the Soviet Union, it might well be desirable for officials immediately concerned with this subject to meet and examine the substantive problem in detail, even if that work might be nullified by a later Soviet attitude.

5. I said that I had no specific instructions but that I would ask you if you wished to make some suggestions along these lines, possibly with concrete suggestions as to when and how discussions between western powers should take place. I should add in this connection that the Americans seemed still quite unwilling to use the C.P.C. or indeed, apparently, anything other than bilateral discussions.

6. It is quite clear not only from Arneson's ignorance of the fact that Dulles was today presenting the memorandum to Zaroubin, but also from Arneson's dry comments on the lack of integration between American agencies concerned, that our difficulties here in discussions at this stage continue to exist. I believe, however, that Arneson would welcome some definite suggestion from the Canadian Government as to the desirability and preferably the nature of discussions between the western powers concerned. He would like to transmit this to the Secretary of State and intimated that it might expedite the whole proceeding.

7. I made no direct reference to the form in which substantive negotiations with the Russians might take place, nor did I ask questions. I assume, however, from your previous telegrams on this aspect that you may wish to instruct me to put at least some point of view. There appear to be no American plans in this connection.

8. I should be grateful also if you would inform me whether it would be useful to discuss the present situation with Makins and if so, whether there are particular Canadian views which I might put before him.

9. I have not marked this for repetition to London but you may wish to send it or some short indication of the situation here.

PRESIDENT EISENHOWER'S ATOMIC ENERGY PROPOSALS

You may recall that on March 19, the United States Government gave a Memorandum to the Soviet Government outlining U.S. views as to how the Eisenhower proposals for the peaceful use of atomic energy might be implemented. The Soviet reply was given to Mr. Dulles by Mr. Molotov in Geneva on April 27. In brief, the Soviet position was that it could not consider the Eisenhower proposals unless there was a prior agreement to prohibit atomic weapons.

2. The United States up to now has treated the substance of the Soviet reply with great secrecy and the text of the Russian Note was given to the Canadian Government only after attention had been drawn to the United States desire to keep it secret. However, this morning's Montreal Gazette carries a story from the New York Times correspondent in Geneva, dated May 9, giving the substance of the Soviet reply.

3. In anticipation of a possible question in the House, we asked our Embassy in Washington this morning to find out as soon as possible what the State Department proposes to say. The State Department has requested our Ambassador to call and discuss the matter later this morning and we expect to have his report some time this afternoon. In the meantime, if a question is asked in the House, I suggest that you state that you are not at present in a position to comment but that you hope to be able to make a statement later today or tomorrow.

PRESIDENT EISENHOWER'S PROPOSALS ON ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY

The State Department have given us a memorandum, which is copied in our immediately following telegram. Their suggestion is that President Eisenhower should make a speech on this subject in about three weeks. The tentative lines of this speech are: That the Soviet Union has indicated that it would participate only under its own conditions (and that these are unacceptable); that the United States can now go ahead with friendly countries to negotiate a treaty for an agency; that it is hoped that all nations interested in atomic energy will eventually become members; that the United States will hold available a reasonable amount of fissionable material and hopes that other countries will do the same. He would add that the countries involved have been consulted and agree to these general principles.

2. The State Department assume that the process of making a treaty would take time. In the interval they would propose to help individual countries to set up small-scale reactors. They might provide training for nationals of other countries in reactors and might furnish fissionable material on these bilateral arrangements. The points mentioned in this paragraph may also be included in the President's speech.

3. Copies of this memorandum will now be given to the United Kingdom, France, Belgium, Australia, South Africa, and Portugal.

4. The State Department would be grateful for at least a preliminary answer next week. They point out that while this time is short, the memorandum appears to be so close to Canadian original proposals, that it might not require a long period to consider. They would, however, welcome any suggestions in the form of changes, additions, or deletions that you might think important.

PRESIDENT EISENHOWER'S PROPOSALS ON ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY

The following is the text of the memorandum mentioned in telegram under reference. Begins: The United States has considered the situation arising out of the refusal of the Soviet Government to participate in the International Atomic Energy Agency proposed by the President in his speech of December 8, 1953, before the General Assembly of the United Nations.

The United States believes that, even in the absence of Soviet participation, an International Atomic Energy Agency can usefully be formed by the nations willing to support its activities. The program for organizing such an agency should not delay present plans for bilateral cooperation, under the provisions of section 123 of the Atomic Energy Act as revised.

Early announcement of plans for proceeding with the international agency and with other international cooperative activities is considered desirable.

The International Atomic Energy Agency as it is now conceived would be established by treaty among interested nations. It would be loosely affiliated with the United Nations, the exact nature of the relationship to be subsequently agreed upon. It is expected that the agency will be open to all countries (including the USSR) which accept the objectives and obligations stated in the treaty. Initially, the primary functions of the agency would be to support training and exchange of technical information and services, to encourage cooperation in research, to assist nations wishing to acquire facilities such as small-scale reactors, and in general to aid nations in developing their capability to achieve the peacetime benefits of atomic energy and in particular nuclear power. Nations in a position to do so would make available source or fissionable material for projects approved by the agency, but it is not expected that at the start the agency would hold stocks of fissionable material. The United States is prepared at the outset to hold a reasonable amount of fissionable material at the call of the agency. The operating expenses of the agency would be allocated on an equitable basis to participating countries and costs of projects such as construction of reactors would be borne by the nations in which they are constructed.

The United States foresees that some considerable time may elapse before a treaty can be negotiated and the necessary ratifications obtained. During this period it is planned that the United States will initiate activities of the sort which the agency might, in due course, appropriately take over. Activities of this sort now under study include a training course in reactor engineering, and bilateral assistance in the construction of small-scale reactors abroad (including provision of necessary modest amounts of fissionable material).

The United States requests that the other nations principally involved indicate at an early date if they agree in principle with this general outline for establishing an international agency at this time. Ends.

PRESIDENT EISENHOWER'S PROPOSALS ON ATOMIC ENERGY

The Advisory Panel on Atomic Energy met today to consider the matters covered by your telegrams Nos. WA-1424 and WA-1425 of August 18.

2. The Panel considered that the outline in paragraph 4 of WA-1425 of the concept and method of operation of the International Agency corresponded so closely with Canadian views that there could be no objection to a statement by President Eisenhower that Canada agrees with the general principles. In this connection we would like to know precisely how and when the United States announcement is to be made as the Canadian Government will probably wish to associate itself publicly with the plan.

3. The Panel expressed the hope that the United States announcement will be couched in terms which will not encourage false hopes. A study of the new United States legislation makes it clear that the negotiation of agreements under Sections 123 and/or 124 of the Atomic Energy Act will be a slow process, and when this is coupled with the current state of the art of applying atomic energy to peaceful purposes, it is evident that it will be some time before recipient countries receive significant benefits.

4. The Panel was concerned over the possibility that the President, in his speech, might say that because some considerable time might elapse before the Agency could be established, the United States proposed during this interim period to initiate activities of the sort which the Agency might in due course appropriately take over. The Panel considered that, if at all possible, it would be desirable to avoid public reference to the question of interim arrangements and in particular to unilateral United States plans for such arrangements, at least until an effort could be made to arrive at a modus operandi with the other countries capable of launching similar programmes. The Panel felt that the proposal to make interim arrangements gave rise to a number of difficulties, and that little advantage in time would be gained because of the necessity for compliance with Section 123 of the new Act. It seemed to the Panel that if the United States did make such a unilateral announcement, other contributor countries would have to do likewise, and the establishment of bilateral arrangements anticipating the Agency's actions on an unco-ordinated basis between different groups of countries might adversely affect the establishment of the International Agency. Moreover, the announcement might be used by those unfriendly to the United States as a basis for charges that it was attempting to secure a dominant position with respect to the peaceful uses of atomic energy vis-à-vis other countries.

5. The Panel assumed that if the United States should make a bilateral arrangement with another country, e.g. Belgium, it would then presumably proceed to make available to that country classified information now covered by the Modus Vivendi of 1948. It was suggested that at some appropriate time you might put this to the U.S. authorities and ask them if they agree with our assumption that if this is so, we would be free to do likewise.

6. The Panel's views are being submitted to Ministers and as soon as approval is obtained we will notify you in order that you may communicate them to the State Department as the views of the Canadian Government. In the meantime we see no reason why you should not advise the State Department informally of the Canadian reaction to the United States proposals.⁴⁰

PRESIDENT EISENHOWER'S PROPOSALS ON ATOMIC ENERGY

We were asked to attend yesterday an informal meeting in the State Department to discuss in a preliminary way the project of an international atomic energy agency. In addition to Mr. Gerard Smith and one of his assistants, the only other person present was a representative of the British Embassy. We were given two copies of a "Preliminary Outline of an International Atomic Energy Agency"; one copy of this is attached. It was made clear to us that this paper was a very preliminary one and should not yet be regarded as more than a draft prepared in one office of the State Department.

2. A number of points were brought up in the course of a long meeting and we shall attempt to draw them to your attention under headings:

A. Procedure for Reaching Agreement on a Treaty or Comparable Document

(i) The State Department officers asked us whether we thought it would be possible to have at least preliminary and informal conversations between representatives of the United States, United Kingdom and Canada. We all agreed that if this were done, the fact of such conversations would have to remain confidential, as otherwise it would embarrass the State Department in relations with other countries particularly concerned. On the other hand, there are obvious great advantages in three-way study as the first stage. Only the three countries in question have seriously considered and discussed previously the proposed agency and only these three have had in the past close relations with each other on atomic energy matters generally. We made the personal comment that on the whole we saw real advantages in such a procedure, subject to your approval. I should add that Gerard Smith does not yet know whether his own superior officers would approve of what he tentatively suggested.

On August 31, 1954, the Department advised the Ambassador in the United States that the Panel's views were the official policy of the Canadian Government.

(ii) The countries "principally involved" are made up, as you know, of the following: the United Kingdom, United States, Canada, France, Belgium, Portugal, South Africa, and Australia. These then would be the group which would consider the agency either after it had been worked on by the three, or initially. The question arises as to whether a working party, as suggested by the French, would be desirable. Our own preliminary impression was that the countries other than the three would have fewer comments to make than the three themselves, but that probably it would be necessary to provide some forum in which the matter could be discussed as between all the countries principally concerned. If the three countries had already agreed (though not admitting it), the working party would perhaps tend to have a brief life but have some value in avoiding any hurt feelings. We should be grateful for your comments on this point as well.

(iii) The next question in the procedural field is how to deal with the countries not principally involved, i.e., those other than the eight. No views were expressed on this and the State Department have not yet even a list of what these countries might be.

B. Relations with the United Nations

(i) The present intention which has been made known to the press here is that the Secretary of State should in his general statement in the opening period of the General Assembly devote some time to explaining the plan for an atomic energy agency. It is thought that this should be followed up by a more detailed statement by the Permanent Representative in a committee of the Assembly. The present thought is that he would do this on an emergency item in the nature of a report and not directed towards a vote. We were asked what we thought of the above, particularly whether there should be the second report attached to an agenda item.

(ii) There are obviously a series of traps in bringing this subject before the Assembly at all, necessary as that may be. It is almost inevitable, it seems to us, that the Soviet Union will take advantage of this item, however raised, to make their usual speeches on the necessity of banning the bomb and on the unreal and deceptive nature of the President's proposals.

(iii) The State Department plan to give us as early as they can a draft of Mr. Dulles' intended remarks before the General Assembly, presumably for any comments, and later on a final text both of Mr. Dulles' speech and of Mr. Lodge's, if he is to make one.

(iv) We have not yet been given any suggestions on what is perhaps the more important aspect, that is, the continuing relation of the agency to the United Nations. Any suggestions you might have on this would, we are sure, be welcomed. Incidentally, we were told that the Secretary General of the United Nations was informally advised in advance of the President's Labour Day speech and also informed that the Secretary of State would make a further statement in the General Assembly.

*C. Proposed Scientific Conference*⁴¹

(i) We were told yesterday that Professor Rabi had received a good response in the United Kingdom to his approach on this conference. We were also told incidentally that Mr. Longhair was present at at least some of these discussions. No doubt you will have had some report from Mr. Longhair and if so, perhaps you could let us have a copy. There is in the State Department what looks like a lengthy report by Professor Rabi, and minutes by Sir John Crockroft. We were not given a copy of these documents, perhaps on the assumption that they had already gone to Mr. Longhair.

(ii) There has been some discussion of whether or not it would be desirable to have United Nations sponsorship of the scientific conference. The State Department have the impression that the United Kingdom would favour this. The French view evidently is that sponsorship would be helpful if the Soviet Union was to be encouraged to attend the meeting but that otherwise it would be less helpful. The United States thinking leans now less towards United Nations sponsorship of the atomic energy agency and therefore officials are less inclined to think of United Nations sponsorship of the scientific conference. Gerard Smith personally suggested that the scientific conference might come under the sponsorship of the United Kingdom, United States, and Canada. In answer to a question, he said that he thought there would be no difficulty on the financing of the conference, since the United States Departments could obtain the necessary funds from private sources.

(iii) They are wondering as to the best location of the scientific conference. They would still hope that it could be held in the United States, provided that the immigration difficulties could be overcome.

D. Subsequent Discussions

Gerard Smith asked the British Embassy representative and ourselves to meet him again next week, which we agreed to do. He does not, of course, expect any authoritative answers or comments on the various points raised. On the other hand, if there is any guidance which you would care to give us by the middle of next week, we should appreciate having it.

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

Projet d'une note
Draft Memorandum

SECRET

[Washington], September 8, 1954

PRELIMINARY OUTLINE OF AN INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY

I. The Objectives of the Agency

The International Atomic Energy Agency shall have the following objectives:

A. To encourage world-wide research and development of peaceful uses of atomic energy, by assuring that scientists and engineers of the world have sufficient materials for such activities and by fostering the interchange of information.

B. To arrange for nuclear materials to meet the needs of agriculture, medicine and other peaceful activities including the eventual production of power.

C. To conduct its activities in such a manner as to prepare for the time when use of atomic energy for peace becomes the predominant and perhaps the exclusive use of atomic energy.

II. Organization of the International Atomic Energy Agency

A. The Agency will be created by and derive its authority under the terms of a treaty or other international arrangement among the participating nations. The treaty will define standards and principles which will govern the Agency in the discharge of its functions, and will state the obligations of the members of the Agency. The treaty will specify procedures for amendment in order to permit the Agency to assume greater responsibilities in the interest of member nations and of world peace.

B. All states which originally ratify the treaty shall become members of the Agency. Subsequently, all applicant states shall be accepted to membership in the Agency and sign the treaty when, in the judgment of the Board of Governors, they have duly accepted applicable commitments regarding the supplying of materials and information for the work of the Agency, provision of financial support, and facilitating open discussion and contacts among scientists engaged in peaceful research activities.

C. Governing Body:

1. The Agency shall be managed by a Board of Governors consisting of nine persons representing governments. The principal contributors of materials shall be represented in the Board of Governors and other representatives shall be elected with due regard for geographical distribution.

2. Decisions of the Board of Governors will be taken by majority vote.

D. Staff — The staff of the Agency shall be headed by an administrative head or general manager, appointed for a fixed term by the Board of Governors and subject to its control. The staff may include highly qualified scientific and technical personnel, though technical advice will in the main come from consultants provided by member nations. Under the general supervision of the Board, the administrative head shall be responsible for the appointment, organization, and functioning of the staff.

E. Financing:

1. Expenses for the operation of the Agency and for any necessary facilities and fixed plant shall be met by the member states in accordance with a scale of contribution to be defined in the treaty, with provision for modification as new members are added.
2. Funds for specific projects submitted by member nations will be provided by the submitting nations through specific arrangements in each case.

F. The administrative headquarters of the Agency will be located in _____.

G. Relationship to the United Nations and other international bodies. In accomplishing its objectives, the Agency will as appropriate consult and cooperate with UN bodies whose work may be related to that of the Agency, and will make reports on its progress and accomplishments to these bodies from time to time. The treaty establishing the Agency will be registered with the United Nations in accordance with Article 102 of the UN Charter. The Agency will cooperate with regional atomic energy organizations (e.g., CERN).

H. The facilities of the Agency shall include:

1. Necessary office space for administrative and related activities of the Agency.
2. Those facilities which may be necessary in connection with the Agency's role in arranging and monitoring the provision of nuclear materials, such as physical safeguards and control laboratories for analysis and verification of receipts and inventory control of nuclear materials.
3. Those facilities which prove necessary in connection with the Agency's activities in fostering research, development, education and training.
4. Those facilities which may prove necessary to provide joint technical services for member nations.

III. Functions of the Agency

A. Provision of materials.

1. All member nations possessing stocks of uranium or thorium (in the form of ores, concentrates, metals, or salts), enriched uranium, U-233, plutonium, and alloys of the foregoing will be expected to hold reasonable amounts of such material available for the activities of the Agency.
2. The Agency will arrange and verify shipments of nuclear materials from contributing nations to projects approved by the Agency.
3. The Agency may at a later date have in its custody nuclear materials dedicated to peaceful purposes.

B. Allocation of materials by the Agency.

1. The Agency will review proposals submitted by participating members desiring to receive allocations of materials held available by contributing nations, in the light of uniform and equitable criteria, including:
 - a. The use to which material would be put, including scientific and technical feasibility.

b. The adequacy of plans, funds, technical personnel, etc., to assure effective use of the material.

c. Adequacy of proposed health and safety measures for handling and storing materials and for operating facilities.

d. Equitable distribution of available materials.

2. Title to nuclear materials may either remain with the supplying nation or pass to the recipient nation. Fair payment shall be made for nuclear materials whether leased or purchased. A supplying nation may elect to require the return of fuel elements for chemical processing.

3. In order to insure that adequate health and safety standards are being followed, and in order to assure that allocated fissionable material is being used for the purposes for which it was allocated, the Agency will have authority to approve and monitor agreements for projects. Where amounts of nuclear materials involved are small, the Agency may adopt minimum monitoring procedures. It shall have authority to prescribe certain design and operating conditions, health and safety regulations, require accountability and operating records, specify disposition of by-product fissionable materials and wastes, retain the right of inspection and require progress reports. The Agency would in particular have authority to verify by inspection the status of inventories of allocated material and to verify compliance with the terms of issuance.

4. Information about all transactions entered into by the Agency would be available to all members.

C. Information and service activities of the Agency.

1. The Agency will have available, and will take positive steps to disseminate to members:

a. Data developed by member nations as a result of the utilization of the materials, information, services and other assistance of the Agency.

b. Data developed as a result of the Agency's own activities.

c. Data already publicly available in some of the member nations.

d. Data developed and previously held by member nations and voluntarily contributed to the Agency.

2. In accordance with III (C) (1) (d) above, all member nations possessing information relevant to the activities of the Agency will be expected to make contributions from that information to the Agency.

3. The Agency will encourage the exchange of scientific and technical information among nations, and be responsible for making wide dissemination of the data in its possession.

4. The Agency will serve as an intermediary securing the performance of services by one member for another. Among the specific activities the Agency might provide by this means or through joint facilities might be the following (the cost of such services being borne by the recipient nation):

a. Training and education.

- b. Services concerned with developing codes for public health and safety in connection with the utilization of fissionable materials.
- c. Consultative technical services in connection with the establishment and carrying on of programs.
- d. Supply of special materials, such as heavy water.
- e. Design and supply of specialized equipment.
- f. Special laboratory services such as conduct of experiments and tests.
- g. Aid in making financial arrangements for the support of appropriate projects.

PRESIDENT EISENHOWER'S PROPOSALS ON ATOMIC ENERGY

We discussed your letter of September 9 with the Advisory Panel on Atomic Energy. The following comments are numbered in accordance with your letter.

A. Procedure for Reaching Agreement on Treaty

(i) The Panel is very much in favour of preliminary confidential consultations between the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada. You will recall that on a number of occasions during the preceding negotiations we urged that this should be done.

(ii) The Panel agrees that following the preliminary tripartite discussions it would probably be desirable and necessary to have the proposals considered by a working party of representatives of the countries principally concerned.

(iii) We have no immediate views on how to deal with the countries not principally involved, but will attempt to develop some ideas.

B. Relations with United Nations

The questions you have raised are being considered. Comments will be sent to you later.

C. Proposed Scientific Conference

Longhair has just returned from the United Kingdom. He has a set of Cockroft's minutes and we will send you a copy as soon as we get them. The Panel has no strong views on either the sponsorship or location of the conference. However, it seems to officials of External Affairs that if United Nations' sponsorship is desired the matter should be kept separate from any United Nations item concerning the establishment of the International Agency. This would be of particular importance if the United States decides to raise the question of the Agency at the General Assembly under Rule 15 in the expectation that it will be able to hold off attempts to introduce any form of United Nations control or sponsorship of the Agency.

2. We are studying the draft "Preliminary Outline of an International Atomic Energy Agency" and will send you our comments shortly.

PRESIDENT EISENHOWER'S PROPOSALS ON ATOMIC ENERGY

Your comments were helpful in an informal meeting we had yesterday with representatives of the State Department and the British Embassy.

2. There seems to be no difference of opinion on the views expressed in paras 1(A) and (1)(A)(II) of your telegram.

3. There is, however, a difference between the Americans and the British over how this subject should be introduced into the General Assembly. As we pointed out in para 2(B)(I) of our letter number 1602 of September 9, the present United States intention is to do this in two stages. The British are worried about the second stage, thinking that it would open the way to a protracted and futile discussion and that another delegation might introduce an unhelpful resolution.

4. We were not able to make any comment on this except that contained in your para 1(C).

5. There is to be a further tripartite meeting on Monday afternoon. If you can give us any instruction on the General Assembly aspect before then, it would be helpful in view of the imminence of the Assembly meeting.

PRESIDENT EISENHOWER'S PROPOSALS ON ATOMIC ENERGY

Following from Under-Secretary: We are inclined to agree with London that it would be unwise to include an item on the Agency on the agenda of the forthcoming Assembly. It would seem to be useful for Mr. Dulles in the general debate to refer to the Agency and to report that details are now being worked out in consultation with other interested powers, and inform the Assembly that when agreement had been reached the Agency would seek some form of relationship with the United Nations, but we, like the British are of the opinion that to introduce the matter at this session as an agenda item would open the way to a protracted and futile discussion to no particular purpose.

2. We are repeating your question and our reply to Permdel in New York with the suggestion that they might discuss this with the Minister on Monday morning and telegraph to you any comments he may wish to make.

PRESIDENT EISENHOWER'S PROPOSALS ON ATOMIC ENERGY

We attended yesterday a further meeting in the State Department at which a representative of the British Embassy was also present.

2. The discussions on this subject resemble more a scene in "Alice in Wonderland" than an orderly discussion of a complicated subject. Unfortunately, however, they lack the humour of Lewis Carroll.

Speech by Dulles to the General Assembly

3. We had a quick look at the draft prepared in the State Department. The officials had no knowledge of whether this text would be used, it having been taken to Duck Island. We can only hope that it will be materially changed, since it struck us as unnecessarily provocative and somewhat too detailed. The draft specifically refers to a subsequent speech by Lodge, it describes some interim measures by the United States, and it forecasts the conference of scientists. The draft is intended to give the quantity of U235 to be earmarked for the agency by the United States. This would be given in figures. Tomkins protested against using a figure without previous consultation with the United Kingdom on the ground that the figure might not be such as the United Kingdom could or would match. It was inferred that this was a central point that could even govern the whole attitude of the United Kingdom towards the agency. We expressed more tentatively the view that the figure would be better omitted. Smith said during this discussion that the amount of U235 that the United States contemplated would be sufficient for about a dozen research reactors.

Presentation of the Atomic Energy Agency to the U.N.

4. The plan for consultation over Dulles' speech has, of course, failed. The United States seems determined to follow with an agenda item on which Lodge will speak of both the agency and the conference of scientists. The State Department are guessing that the date of this would be Mid-October. They seem to have no idea of how far Lodge intends to go on the agency; but as far as we could clarify the issue, it seems that our efforts should now be directed towards making any changes which you suggest on the document sent to you with our letter 1602 of September 9. This paper now appears to have the approval of the United States agencies concerned. The State Department is anxious to get your comments. We would suggest that these should be made as quickly as possible, especially as it appears that Lodge's statement will at least be based on this paper. In other words, the completion of the outline of the agency and the preparation of Lodge's speech are becoming inseparable. While it occurred to us here that the paper would benefit from redrafting, Tomkins indicated that the United Kingdom were at least in general agreement.

5. There follows detail on the programme to be undertaken by the United States in the interim period and on the conference of scientists.

Interim Programme

6. John Hall, Director of the Office of Special Projects of the AEC, outlined the activities in international cooperation that the United States plan to undertake in the interim before the International Atomic Energy Agency is established. These activities have been reviewed by Strauss and they can be considered as having his approval.

7. A reactor school is to be set up at either Argonne or Brookhaven. It will cover unclassified information only and the curriculum will be similar to that given in the school which was held recently for the Belgians. It will be a six months course and the first session will probably start in February. A second session will be held if there are sufficient applicants. The course would take eighty students and it is planned to admit fifty foreigners and thirty Americans. The mechanics of issuing invitations and accepting applicants will be the responsibility of the State Department but the AEC will require some evidence that the applicants are technically qualified to undertake the course.

8. The AEC already operate for their own nationals an advance reactor school dealing with classified information and they may be prepared, after agreements to cooperate have been signed, to admit Canadian or United Kingdom scientists to this school.

9. In addition to the reactor school, the AEC plan three types of short training courses:

(a) The radioactive isotope school. This school has been in operation for some years and a few foreign scientists have been admitted. It is planned to enlarge the school so that all qualified foreign applicants can be accepted.

(b) Short courses in industrial medicine, industrial hygiene and radiological physics at Brookhaven, the University of Rochester and other laboratories. Also the facilities for consultations and discussions on cancer research at Argonne Cancer Hospital and Massachusetts General Hospital will be made more readily available to foreign physicians and surgeons.

(c) A course on radiation medicine will be established at Brookhaven. Hall thought that this school might be turned over to the International Agency when the agency is finally established.

10. The AEC have plans for assisting friendly countries to build research reactors. Specifications will be made available and certain American scientists will be authorized to act as consultants.

11. Gerard Smith expressed the hope that in some way the United Kingdom and Canada would share in this general programme and asked if any corresponding activities were planned in the United Kingdom and Canada during the interim period. Tomkins said that it was unlikely that the United Kingdom would establish a formal reactor school but most probably would arrange to accept a few foreign scientists for training at Harwell. We could offer no information on Canadian plans and if any activities are contemplated, we hope you will inform us so that we may pass on the information to the Americans.

12. Dulles in his address at the United Nations will make a general reference to this interim training programme and Lodge in his statement at a later date will outline the programme in detail. At the time of Lodge's statement it would be well if we were prepared to say what we intend to do along this line.

International Conference of Scientists

13. Smith said that two things had been decided:

(a) The conference will be sponsored by the United Nations.

(b) It will not be held in the United States. The Americans now are in favour of holding it in Rome in the late spring.

14. The conference will be introduced to the United Nations through the general item on the agenda — “report by the United States on progress on international co-operation in peaceful uses of atomic energy”. Lodge will discuss it in his statement and then a steering committee will be set up to write the agenda, make proposals for issuing invitations and arrange the general plans. The principal nations concerned would be on this steering committee and should dominate it.

15. The State Department gave us a copy of the papers covering the meetings between Rabi and Cockroft in England, namely, an outline programme, suggestions for programme by Cockroft, and organization of an international scientific conference by Cockroft. If you have not already received these papers from Longair, we shall send copies to you by bag.

PRESIDENT EISENHOWER'S PROPOSALS ON ATOMIC ENERGY

Since sending our telegram under reference, we have been given by the State Department a copy of their instructions to New York about the placing of this item on the agenda. It is said that the request should not be made until after the Secretary of State has begun his statement in the general debate. There should be no advance publicity. The following paragraph is added:

“As previously indicated to USUN the department is communicating on a confidential basis its intention to submit such an item to the individuals in the Washington embassies of the states principally involved in this matter with whom the department has been negotiating arrangements for the agenda. The embassies concerned are United Kingdom, Canada, France, Belgium, Portugal, South Africa and Australia”.

PRESIDENT EISENHOWER'S PROPOSALS ON ATOMIC ENERGY

The following is the text of the request and explanatory memorandum mentioned in my telegram under reference:

Text of Request

"I have the honor to request under Rule 15 of the Rules of Procedure that an item entitled 'International cooperation in developing the peaceful uses of atomic energy: report of the United States of America' be added to the agenda of the General Assembly as an important and urgent question.

"In connection with the above-mentioned request I attach an explanatory memorandum, in accordance with Rule 20 of the Rules of Procedure. "Accept, etc."

"Explanatory Memorandum

International cooperation in developing the peaceful uses of atomic energy: report of the United States of America.

"The President of the United States, in his statement to the eighth Regular Session of the General Assembly on December 8, 1953, made far reaching proposals to set up an international atomic energy agency under the aegis of the United Nations to develop plans whereby the peaceful use of atomic energy would be expedited. The President further indicated the willingness of the United States to take up with the powers "principally involved" the development of plans for such an agency.

"During the past year the United States has engaged in discussions on this subject with the powers principally involved with atomic energy matters, and particularly with the USSR. While the attempt to secure the cooperation of the USSR in this endeavour has not been successful, the other governments with whom the United States has discussed this proposal have indicated general agreement on the objectives of the proposal and on the general nature of the international atomic energy agency.

"The United States intends to proceed immediately, in conjunction with the other nations principally involved, to create an international agency to develop the constructive uses of atomic energy. This approach excludes no nation from participation in this great venture. As more precise plans take shape, all nations interested in participating and willing to take on the responsibilities of membership will be welcome to join the planning and execution of this program.

"The United States believes an international scientific conference of representatives of governments and scientists would assist materially in identifying the technical areas in which the international atomic energy agency might operate most effectively and accordingly suggests that the United Nations should convene such a conference. The United States intends at the appropriate time to describe in greater detail the nature of such a conference and its objectives.

"There have been other significant developments during the past year in connection with peaceful uses of nuclear energy concerning which the United States will report.

"The United States believes that an explanation of these matters is of such import to all nations that it warrants the addition of this item to the General Assembly's agenda as an important and urgent matter".

PRESIDENT EISENHOWER'S PROPOSALS ON ATOMIC ENERGY

In telegrams No. EX-1671 of September 15, and EX-1699 of September 17, we gave you our views on the immediate procedural questions raised in your letter of September 9. The purpose of this letter is to comment on the substance of the American proposals put forward in the draft "Preliminary Outline of an International Atomic Energy Agency", dated September 8, 1954, which was forwarded under cover of your letter.

2. As a preliminary observation it might be mentioned that the Advisory Panel on Atomic Energy expressed some irritation at being presented with yet another United States draft document for comment, the more so because of the lack of evidence that much attention had been paid by the U.S. authorities to Canadian views in previous cases. The Panel felt strongly that the time had come for the establishment of a working group composed of both the diplomatic and technical representatives of the countries involved, which could be given the task of preparing a mutually acceptable draft.

3. The following comments are numbered to correspond with the United States draft paper of September 8, 1954:

I. The Objectives of the Agency

No comments.

II. Organization of the International Atomic Energy Agency

A. No comments.

B. No comments.

C. Governing Body:

1. This section specifies that the principal contributors of materials shall be represented on the Board of Governors and other representatives shall be elected with due regard for geographical distribution. This invites the question of what is meant by the phrase "principal contributors of materials". The word "materials" is defined in Section III A.1 as uranium or thorium (in the form of ores, concentrates, metals, or salts), enriched uranium, U-233, plutonium, and alloys of the foregoing. By this description the United States, the United Kingdom, Canada, South Africa, Belgium, Australia and Portugal could all be considered to be able with some justice to claim a permanent seat on the Board of Governors. If you include thorium from monazite you could add India and Brazil to the list. On the other hand France would be excluded from permanent representation.

It seems to us that this point needs to be studied further with a view to developing either a more precise definition or a different formula. Possibly the suggestion we made last January of a system of weighted voting similar to that used by the International Bank would be worth examining.

2. To avoid any possibility of an attempt to take advantage of the United States, it is suggested that the statement "Decisions of the Board of Governors will be taken by majority vote" might be supplemented by the following proviso: "Such decisions shall not purport to impose upon any member country an obligation to make available materials or information except in accordance with the law of that country."

D. No comments.

E. No comments.

F. No comments.

G. Relationship to the United Nations

We assume that the vagueness of this paragraph stems from the indecision of the United States Government on the question of the relationship of the Agency to the United Nations. It is the view of the Canadian Government, as stated in the Report of the Advisory Panel on Atomic Energy, dated January 6, 1954, that it would be desirable for the Agency to be associated with the United Nations, probably as a specialized agency. It is recognized that it is necessary that the Atomic Energy Agency must enjoy a reasonable degree of autonomy so that its operations will not be interfered with by those members of U.N. which are opposed to it, but we can see no reason why the action of bringing it into relationship with the United Nations should prejudice this. The important point at this time, in our view, is that the countries principally concerned, and in particular the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada, should discuss the matter and reach agreement prior to the pending discussions at the General Assembly.

H. Facilities of the Agency

No comments.

III. Functions of the Agency

A. Provision of Materials

Paragraph 1 of this section, which imposes on all member nations possessing stocks of materials to make (hold) reasonable amounts of such materials available for the activities of the Agency, serves to illustrate the difficulties which we believe will arise in attempting to assign permanent appointments to the Board of Governors on the basis of being "principal contributors".

B. Allocation of Materials by the Agency

Paragraph 4 requires that information about all transactions entered into by the Agency would be available to all members. If, as would seem to be possible, some countries could be participants in the Agency without at the same time having bilateral arrangements with the United States under Section 123 of the U.S. Atomic Energy Act, is it not possible that Section 123 might operate to prevent United States compliance with this obligation?

C. Information and Service Activities of the Agency

It seems to us that paragraph 1.A. of this Section might raise the same difficulties for the United States as for B. above.

PRESIDENT EISENHOWER'S PROPOSALS ON ATOMIC ENERGY

Following from the Under-Secretary: When your telegrams arrived we had just finished drafting a letter commenting on the U.S. draft paper of September 8, and we are sending it in today's bag (with a copy to New York).

2. We most heartily endorse your view that it is essential that discussions between the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada should get under way at once. It would seem to be essential that these three-party talks should take place prior to Lodge's speech in the General Assembly, which we understand is to be in October. In our judgment there should be both diplomatic and technical representation at these discussions. A possible incidental benefit is that it might result in the State Department and the Atomic Energy Commission getting together for a change. Unless there are immediate indications that the Americans intend to organize three-party talks I think that we may have to discuss with the United Kingdom the advisability of joint representations to the United States concerning our concern with the way things are developing and make it clear that if they want our support a greater measure of co-operation is necessary. I would welcome your comments on this suggestion.

3. At the last meeting of the Panel the question of what Canada might do by way of international co-operation prior to the establishment of the Agency was discussed briefly but no concrete suggestions emerged. Both Bennett and Lewis are in the United Kingdom at the moment and it is doubtful that we will be able to say anything on this subject until they return. However we will endeavour to obtain a statement of the Canadian position prior to the discussion in the General Assembly.

4. We would appreciate your sending us the papers on the scientific conference.

INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY — RELATIONSHIP
TO THE UNITED NATIONS

From our private talks with members of the United States, United Kingdom and French delegations, it is our impression that the main reason for the United Kingdom and United States reluctance to come to grips with the problem of the relationship between the Atomic Energy Agency and the United Nations is that, within each government, counsels appear to be divided between those who do not wish a technical operation to be interfered with by the United Nations and those who seek the maximum political benefit which could be derived from association with the United Nations.

2. All four delegations take for granted that there will be some kind of relationship between the Agency and the United Nations for each, a specialized agency is one possibility. On balance, however, the United Kingdom view is at present (assuming the Soviet Union will not participate) that the looser the relationship between the Agency and the United Nations the better. The United States view is similar, but with the important qualification that they are deliberately seeking the maximum political benefit from their proposal and have therefore been led to bring their item into the Assembly against the wishes of the United Kingdom. The French position is that some sort of specialized agency would provide an appropriate relationship, probably linked to ECOSOC.

3. At our four power meeting yesterday, Wadsworth (United States) asked us to defer raising the problem of relationship on the grounds that the plans for the Agency itself would have to be developed more concretely, probably following the conference of scientists next spring, and that it might be premature to discuss the relationship until the Agency was established. He said, however, that he did not see how the United States could agree to "vesting control in an international secretariat" such as would serve a specialized agency.

4. This view was reinforced by Williams of the United Kingdom delegation, who pointed out that the original United States proposal for a pool had now been watered down to an agency that would merely be a "a broker" between suppliers and users of fissionable materials and "know-how". The contrast between the March 19 proposals of the United States (now published with the rest of the United States-Soviet documents) is, he thought, bound to give rise to difficulty in the committee debate.

5. In the March 19 memorandum, the United States proposed that the agency should "report to the General Assembly and the Security Council when requested by either of these organs". Wadsworth said he now thought that reports to the General Assembly might be all that would be required, but he was not sure whether, in the committee debate this year, the United States would go even this far despite the fact that they were now publicly on record as having made such a proposal to the U.S.S.R.

6. At our suggestion, it was agreed by all present at yesterday's meeting that, because of the importance which would be given to the relationship problem in any debate here, we should at least try among the four delegations to work out a common line on what we should say in the committee debate on this question. This effort at precision cannot, in our opinion, wait for next year. In plenary speeches, the representatives of the Philippines and Pakistan have already given the lead, which other under-developed countries will certainly follow, in seeking a close relationship between the agency and the United Nations, in order to have some say in the operation of the agency when established and, if possible, during its formative stage. This difficulty was clearly foreseen by the United Kingdom delegation and ourselves when we sought to dissuade the United States from submitting an item this year. Having taken the plunge, we must, however, anticipate pressure from the under-developed countries, and we think the only way we can do so intelligently is to work out, in the three or four weeks we may have before this debate begins in the First Committee, some reasonable relationship which will meet our political objectives without in any way prejudicing the effective control of the agency passing from the hands of the principal contributors.

7. Although we did not make any specific suggestions at yesterday's meeting, we ourselves consider that these twin objectives could be achieved by means of a specialized agency similar to the International Bank which could be set up as proposed by the eight principal contributors and which could then negotiate a specialized agency relationship with ECOSOC. It would be unnecessary to have the atomic energy agency reporting to ECOSOC if it was preferred that it should report to the Disarmament Commission or even direct to the General Assembly. There is much to be said, however, from both the political and practical aspects, for the agency to report in the first instance to either ECOSOC or the Disarmament Commission, as an assembly debate on their reports would in any case follow.

8. In favour of an ECOSOC relationship, it can be argued that a "billion dollar" agency, as foreseen by Wadsworth yesterday, will have the greatest importance in international economic affairs. It is also an operation analogous to technical assistance.

9. In favour of a Disarmament Commission relationship, is not only the fact of permanent Canadian membership on this body, but the clear interest the Disarmament Commission has had from its inception (see the 1951 Assembly debates) in not only the international control but the development of peaceful uses of atomic energy.

10. To sum up, the arguments in favour of defining as soon as we can the relationship of the proposed agency to the United Nations might be put as follows:

(a) The scheme was born with a proposal that the agency should be set up "under the aegis of the United Nations";

(b) The United States has proposed, in its March 19 memorandum to the USSR, that the agency should report to General Assembly and the Security Council and should also consult and cooperate with other United Nations bodies whose work may be related to that of the agency;

(c) If it appears from the committee debate that the western powers want to dodge the issue of relationship and would really prefer to set up the agency outside the United Nations, the Soviet Union will have nothing to do with the proposal, whereas it is possible that the Soviet now might participate in organizing a United Nations specialized agency;

(d) Soviet participation in the agency is desirable on many grounds not least for the partial penetration of the iron curtain which might develop in this field;

(e) Since the Soviet aide mémoire of September 22, it is no longer so easy for the western powers to argue that the USSR has in effect rejected the United States proposals by imposing impossible pre-conditions, inasmuch as the Soviet Government no longer poses the banning of the use of the bomb as a pre-condition for joining an international atomic energy agency;

(f) If our general policy is to strengthen the United Nations, this as the Minister said in his opening statement, is one field in which the United Nations should not be by-passed.

INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY — RELATIONSHIP
TO THE UNITED NATIONS

As you suggest, it would seem imperative to reach as much agreement and precision as possible in the thinking of Western countries, including at least the United States, United Kingdom, France and Canada, on the best means of implementing the proposed scheme for an International Atomic Energy Agency before that proposal is debated in Committee One. We are repeating separately our telegram EX-1901 to Washington giving our further views on the constitutional character of the Agency. This message is concerned mainly with the question of relationship between the Agency and the United Nations.

2. The detailed relationship with the U.N. obviously cannot be worked out before the character of the new organization has been determined nor, perhaps, before the Agency has been established. We envisage that this will take place at an intergovernmental conference of interested countries, and that while it might be practical and politic to invite as observers or advisers U.N. specialists on technical questions such as personnel, administration and the like, we do not contemplate that the U.N. as such would control the establishment of the Agency.

3. Nevertheless it seems desirable to agree in principle now on the question of relationship since it seems probable that this will be discussed in the Assembly. The suggestions on this question in paragraph G of the revised preliminary outline of the United States scheme, dated September 30, seem to us inadequate and unnecessarily vague.

4. Our general policy is to strengthen the United Nations and an agency completely divorced from the U.N. would create suspicion of Western good faith. We therefore think that, in addition to depositing the treaty setting up the Agency with the U.N. under Article 102, a specialized agency relationship ought to be entered into along the lines of the International Bank's agreement with the U.N. This would establish a clear-cut link with United Nations and yet would protect the Agency's autonomy by

(i) stressing the Agency's need to function independently and to safeguard confidential information,

(ii) limiting right of reciprocal representation,

(iii) limiting obligation of the Agency to include agenda items proposed by the United Nations,

(iv) restricting right of the United Nations to present recommendations in the absence of reasonable prior consultation,

(v) recognizing that it would be sound policy for the United Nations to refrain from making recommendations on particular operations,

(vi) limiting the compulsory character of Security Council decisions,

(vii) permitting full independence in respect of the form and content of the budget,

(viii) providing for termination of relationship on six months' notice.

5. In this way, based on the precedents of the Bank and Fund, it should be possible subsequently to devise an agreement with the United Nations that would satisfy even the strictest criteria for control and security. Any such danger as contemplated by the Americans that control might be "vested in an international secretariat" could be obviated by appropriate provisions in the constitution of the Agency (including a system of weighted voting) and in the agreement with the United Nations.

6. Once the new Agency is established through intergovernmental agreement, and once it is brought into relationship with the United Nations, the question arises whether it should report through the Economic and Social Council or through a body such as the Disarmament Commission. In favour of the Disarmament Commission it can be argued (a) that we are permanent members of the Disarmament Commission and only occasional members of the Economic and Social Council; (b) the Disarmament Commission by its very terms of reference has a continuing interest in the peaceful uses of atomic energy; and (c) that since the Disarmament Commission reports to the First Committee of the Assembly, it is likely that greater attention would be focussed on its discussions of the work of the proposed new Agency than would be the case if these discussions were reported through ECOSOC to the General Assembly, a procedure which is less likely to attract public interest and attention. However, it seems to us that on balance reporting through ECOSOC would be preferable. Here the main considerations would appear to be:

(a) The public view of the Disarmament Commission is coloured by the frustration and fright arising out of the stalemate on disarmament.

(b) The Disarmament Commission's tribulations in respect of disarmament might adversely affect the objectivity of its concern for the peaceful uses of atomic energy.

(c) The Disarmament Commission can be disbanded by an ordinary resolution of the Assembly.

(d) The chief importance and appeal of the President's proposal would seem to be in the hope of accelerated economic advance it offers to less fortunate countries, which relates closely to subjects dealt with in ECOSOC.

(e) The usual manner of linking a Specialized Agency with the United Nations is through ECOSOC.

(f) ECOSOC could do with more useful and high priority work and a working scheme of this character in the field of the peaceful use of atomic energy seems closely related to its aims.

7. If the Agency's need to function independently and to safeguard confidential information is protected in the agreement with United Nations, the question of reporting to the United Nations, whether through ECOSOC or otherwise, need not cause real anxiety, and ECOSOC or Assembly debates should not prove more difficult than for the Bank and Fund. Accordingly the objection that Canada is not always a member of ECOSOC is not compelling. In particular it is to be noted that Article 64 of the Charter uses permissive language and indicates that "the Economic and Social Council may take appropriate steps to obtain regular reports from the Specialized Agencies". Presumably, if it were desirable on occasion for the Disarmament Commission to receive a certain type of report on the work of the Agency, adequate arrangements could be made to use the Disarmament Commission on occasion for this purpose.

8. We hope that you will discuss these tentative views with other interested delegations especially the Americans and let us know their reactions as soon as possible. Our own thinking is still exploratory on both the question of the constitution of the Agency and of its relationship to the United Nations. The fullest indication of the thoughts of other countries and of the Secretary-General's committee will help us to refine these views.

9. Tactically we would wish to avoid a detailed discussion of the relationship question in the Assembly at this stage, since that might tend unduly to take away from the interested founding countries the initiative and control in the creation of the Agency and might pre-judge its nature before the interested countries have had an opportunity to assemble in a private intergovernmental conference.

10. Washington please discuss with State Department. Ends.

PRESIDENT EISENHOWER'S PROPOSALS ON ATOMIC ENERGY

Your despatch of October 11 brings out very clearly the major issues which must be resolved prior to the establishment of the International Atomic Energy Agency. As we see them, these might be summarized as follows:

(a) Is the Agency to receive supplies of nuclear materials from donor nations and subsequently to furnish the materials to applicant nations (U.S. Proposal of March 19), or is it to function primarily as a "broker" (Current U.S. Proposal)?

(b) What influence should the participation or non-participation of the Soviet Union have on Western policy regarding the role of the Agency?

(c) How is the Agency to be organized and governed?

(d) What is to be the relationship of the Agency to the United Nations?

In the following paragraphs the Canadian position on these issues will be discussed in some detail.

Role of the Agency

2. You are correct in your understanding (paragraph 7 of your despatch) that the Canadian Government believes that the role of the Agency should be to assist in making arrangements between nations for the provision of materials and technical assistance for approved projects and facilitate the flow of scientific information, rather than function as a "bank" receiving stocks of fissionable materials from donor countries and issuing them to applicant nations. It is considered that this provides the most practical basis for operation, removes the necessity for a large staff and for a large capital investment in plant, and avoids the thorny problems which would stem from a decision that the Agency should itself hold stocks of nuclear material.

Participation by the Soviet Union

3. The views expressed above are in no way affected by the question of whether or not the Soviet Union participates in the Agency. We agree with you that it does not seem realistic to contemplate two plans, one for use in event of Soviet participation, and another if it appears that the U.S.S.R. will not join. Like you, we believe that the convention setting up the Agency must contain sufficient provisions and safeguards that the Agency can at any time accept the entry of Russia.

4. As you suggest, the problem of determining how the Agency would deal with applications for assistance is a difficult one. Apart from the political implications in reaching a decision as to whether the applicant country would be referred to say, Russia or the United States, economic considerations will become increasingly important, and commercial rivalries between such countries as the United States, the United Kingdom, and for that matter, Canada, may cause even more trouble than purely political differences. We suspect that in the end a pragmatic approach may well prevail.

5. It seems to us, however, that these problems would be as much a part of the March 19 proposal as the current one, and we can see no advantage in reverting to the earlier scheme. As you say, it should be possible to write a convention on the lines of the present outline that will provide safeguards for all contingencies.

6. One important point to be kept in mind is that we, and also, we believe, the United States and the United Kingdom, regard the proposed agency as a means of supplementing existing arrangements, particularly with a view to helping the less advanced countries. It is not our thought that the proposed agency should preclude the continuance of existing arrangements or prevent new arrangements being made with other nations outside its framework.

Organization and Governing of the Agency

7. In your telegram No. WA-1683 of September 25,[†] you reported that the United Kingdom considered that at least originally the membership of the Agency might be confined to contributing nations, but that United States officials thought it was desirable for appearance's sake that at least some nations who might benefit greatly, but who had nothing to contribute, should be members in the beginning. However, the Annex to the U.S. Preliminary Outline, forwarded under cover of your despatch of October 11, suggests that, "Alternatively, membership might be limited to nations in a position to make a substantial contribution in the form of materials or technical knowledge and services, with beneficiary nations not undertaking the obligations of membership."

8. The advantages of limiting the nations concerned with the proposed agency during the period while the convention is being drafted, to those in a position to make contributions to the Agency, are obvious. In our judgment however, once the Agency has been established and the Convention ratified by the charter members, membership should be open to any nation willing to undertake the obligations set forth in the Convention, and not limited to those "in a position to make a substantial contribution." It seems to us that such limitations in membership would weaken or even destroy the political advantages accruing from the western initiative in establishing the Agency. In addition it might well tend to reduce the value and effectiveness of the Agency as a medium for facilitating the exchange of information.

9. Assuming that membership in the Agency is open to any nation prepared to subscribe to the obligations of the Convention, it would seem that the International Bank provides a useful model in devising the system by which the Agency is to be governed. A scheme along the following lines might be possible:

- (a) Each member nation would have a representative on the Governing Council.
- (b) The budget would be divided between member countries. Payment by any given country of its share of the budget would entitle its representative to cast a given number of votes, say one hundred, at the Governing Council.
- (c) Nations setting aside nuclear material for the purpose of the Agency would be assigned additional voting power, dependent upon the quantity and quality of the nuclear material. For example an assignment of a given quantity of refined uranium would carry with it more votes than an assignment of uranium ore. It might be necessary to specify upper limits to the amounts of any given material which could be assigned to the Agency, and the proportion of the total amount which could be assigned by any one country.

(d) As in the case of the International Bank, the Governing Council would delegate most of its powers to a Board of Directors, composed of representatives of the five nations possessing the largest number of votes, and four additional nations elected annually by the members of the Governing Council not represented on the Board of Directors.

10. It will be appreciated that we are by no means firmly wedded to a scheme along the lines suggested above. It is put forward in the absence of United States or United Kingdom suggestions as a means of stimulating discussion.

Relationship of the Agency to the United Nations

11. Our views concerning the relationship of the Agency to the United Nations have been set out in detail in a telegram we are sending to the Chairman of the Canadian Delegation to the General Assembly in New York, and which will be repeated to you.

Drafting of a Convention

12. We are not convinced that with so many unresolved details, both political and technical, there is much to be gained by our attempting, in isolation, to draft a convention. As we have said before, we think the way to do this is to have a tripartite drafting body with both diplomatic and technical representation. If such a body were set up we would make arrangements to have a senior official from Atomic Energy of Canada Limited (probably Mr. Bennett) serve as the Canadian technical representative. If the United States is not prepared to approach the problem in this way, then it seems to us that our position should be that we have given our views to the United States Government on the substance of the matter, and we will consider any draft convention that it prepares, but that for the present at any rate, we have no intention of drafting a convention ourselves.

13. We note that arrangements are now under way for a meeting in Washington on October 23, between diplomatic and technical representatives of the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada. This seems to us to be a hopeful sign that there may yet be effective tripartite discussion of the problems which must be resolved before the Agency can be established.

ATOMIC ENERGY

As you may have expected, there was considerable activity here on atomic energy over the weekend. As a preliminary step in our talks we prepared a short paper incorporating the views expressed in your EX-1900 and EX-1901 and presented this to the State Department and to the British Embassy early on Friday morning. We thought that in this way we could set out our concern with this problem and could emphasize the points that we considered to be the major issues. We entitled our paper "Canadian comments on certain questions relating to the International Atomic Energy Agency", posed the four questions given in EX-1901 and quoted your comments at length.

2. On Friday morning we met with the United Kingdom representatives. On our side, besides myself, Bennett, Lewis and Babbitt were present. For the United Kingdom, Sir Roger Makins was there and in addition, Sir Edwin Plowden, Sir John Cockroft, Edward Tomkins and, for a time, Sir Robert Scott. This meeting had been suggested in order that we might coordinate our thinking on the problems that we were to discuss with the Americans on Saturday, but it was apparent from the beginning that there was some confusion about the object of the meeting. The United Kingdom representatives were interested only in negotiations for a bilateral "agreement to cooperate" with the Americans and had little or no interest in the Agency. As Plowden said, he and Cockroft did not come all the way to Washington to discuss the Agency; they were interested only in obtaining bilateral — or, better still, trilateral — cooperation with the Atomic Energy Commission. On our side, as you know, our main concern was the Agency; Bennett is sure that he will get a "bilateral agreement" from the AEC and although he wants to see the United Kingdom get a similar agreement he knows that under the new act these agreements will have to be bilateral and that a tripartite arrangement is not possible. He was not interested, therefore, in coordinating our approach to the United States with that of the United Kingdom any more closely than he had already done in England.

3. It was evident that the United Kingdom are fairly happy about present planning for the Agency and they intimated to us that they are now prepared to meet the discussions at the United Nations. I expressed our concern that Committee One would be debating atomic energy in two weeks and we felt that it was imperative that we reach agreement on several important points before the debate began. Although Makins clearly felt that the primary purpose of the meeting with the United States was not the Agency, he agreed that it would be useful for me to present our views. On our side, although Bennett afterwards expressed some misgivings, we agreed that Makins should make his plea for tripartite cooperation.

4. The meeting on Saturday at the Atomic Energy Commission was a sizable gathering. The United Kingdom and ourselves were represented as on Friday. For the Atomic Energy Commission, besides Strauss, two of the Commissioners, Murray and Campbell, were present, and the General Manager, Nichols, the General Counsel, Mitchell, McDaniel from the Research Division, Rabi of General Advisory Committee and several others. Gerard Smith was there for the State Department.

5. Makins started the meeting by making his plea for maintenance of the tripartite relation that had existed under the CPC. Strauss said that he felt a kindred feeling about tripartite cooperation but unfortunately the new Atomic Energy Act would not permit the United States to make a tripartite agreement since it specifically limited cooperation to bilateral agreements. He said, however, that the same effect could be obtained by concluding two identical bilateral agreements, one with the United Kingdom and one with Canada. If the same areas were covered in the two agreements and it was specified that in these areas Canada and the United Kingdom were free to pass on information to each other, then in effect the cooperation would be tripartite. Makins said that the United Kingdom was interested only in the effect and would be happy with such an arrangement.

6. There followed considerable discussion on what topics should be included in the agreements to cooperate. Cockroft produced a paper giving some detailed suggestions of the United Kingdom and it was finally decided that early this week the United Kingdom will get together with technical representatives of the Atomic Energy Commission to discuss topics that could be included in an agreement to cooperate. Since neither Bennett nor Lewis is remaining in Washington, Babbitt will represent AECL at these meetings.

7. The meeting then passed to a discussion of the International Atomic Energy Agency. I opened by saying that we were worried about the coming discussions in the United Nations and for that reason had prepared a paper outlining what we thought were the more important problems that required solution. Strauss and the Atomic Energy Commission had not had an opportunity to study our paper but promised to do so. Smith said that the State Department has now decided to accept a Specialized Agency which was one of our main points and was only waiting for confirmation by the Secretary. He said that the Department has prepared a draft speech for Lodge to use in opening the debate in the United Nations and he thought that we should find most of our points covered in that draft. He said we could have a copy of the draft immediately after the meeting and in addition he would like to discuss our points with us on Monday. We have sent comments on Lodge's statement by teletype.

8. Cockroft then introduced the question of the activities of the Agency and produced a paper giving the United Kingdom ideas. In this paper he considers three classes of reactors which might be promoted by the Agency and estimates the quantity of enriched uranium that would be required by such a programme. We are sending a copy of this paper to you by bag. The Americans said the technical representatives of the Atomic Energy Commission would consider Cockroft's suggestions and would arrange a meeting sometime this week to discuss the activities of the Agency.

9. The final subject discussed at the meeting was the International Conference of Scientists. Dr. Rabi reported on the results of a meeting which was held on Friday at which Cockroft had represented the United Kingdom, and Lewis, Canada. At this meeting the Agenda for the Conference had been gone over in detail and a fairly complete list of suggested speakers drawn up. There is now a more optimistic feeling about this Conference and it seems that it will be possible to present papers that will contribute something worthwhile. The Americans are planning to hold back from publication considerable information that is to be declassified between now and the Conference so that they will have new material for presentation. The Americans asked if the meeting thought it would be appropriate for Lodge to introduce the Agenda for the Conference to the United Nations at the time of his speech. I said we probably would not have any objection but before giving our approval we should want to know whether it would be presented as an American or an agreed document and, in addition, would like to consider whether this would be the best tactics. We shall take this up with the State Department.

INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY

On our first quick reading of Lodge's draft speech on the atomic energy item in Committee One we have noticed two points which are of some concern to us.⁴² On page 8 of our copy of the draft the following words are used: "We explained to representatives of these governments (the United Kingdom, France, Canada, Australia, Belgium, Portugal and South Africa) our views on the nature and organization of the International Atomic Energy Agency and all agree that the refusal of the Soviet Union to participate made it advisable to change in one important respect the concept on which we had previously proceeded. This is that the Agency, at least initially, would not need to hold fissionable materials itself but could act as a clearing house for requests made to the Agency by various beneficiaries . . .". As you are aware, this statement, so far as Canada is concerned, is untrue since we have advocated that the Agency should be established in this latter way irrespective of Soviet participation.

2. The second point which gives us concern is that Lodge's speech does not make it clear to us whether or not in the United States' view the Agency would have to revert to the first concept if the Soviet Union subsequently decided to participate. Our own views on this matter were developed in some detail in paragraphs 3, 4 and 5 of our telegram No. EX-1901 to Washington repeated to you as No. 154 on October 19. We agree with Lodge's argument that Soviet participation, and concrete evidence that the Soviet Union would be willing to give up stores of fissionable material, exchange information, and accept obligations which would signify a different attitude toward the non-communist world, would be most desirable. It seems to us however that this objective need not exclude Soviet participation in an Agency established on the "broker" principle. Then, as mutual trust and confidence grew, and as experience in the operating problems of the Agency was acquired, it could develop in the direction of the original United States proposal. Whatever the American position is to be, it would seem to us that there should be no ambiguity about it since unfriendly countries would no doubt welcome the opportunity to capitalize on it.

3. You might consider suggesting to the United States representative that they take these points into consideration in redrafting Lodge's speech.

INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY

Following is text of United States draft resolution on peaceful uses of atomic energy which was circulated and discussed at a meeting of the United States, United Kingdom, French and Canadian delegations this morning, October 29. Text Begins:

The General Assembly,

Desirous of placing at the service of mankind the benefits stemming from the momentous discovery of nuclear fission;

Believing that all nations should cooperate in promoting the widest dissemination of knowledge in the realm of nuclear technology for peaceful ends;

Hoping that international cooperation in developing and expanding the peaceful uses of atomic energy will assist not only in easing the burdens of hunger, poverty and disease but also in promoting international confidence essential to the maintenance of peace;

A. Concerning an international atomic energy agency

1. Recalls the initiative of the President of the United States embodied in his address of December 8, 1953;

2. Notes with satisfaction that negotiations are in progress for the establishment as quickly as possible of an international atomic energy agency to facilitate the use by the entire world of the peaceful applications of atomic energy;

3. Suggests that the international agency be constituted in such a manner as to encourage international cooperation and the sharing of responsibilities in the further development and practical application of atomic energy for the benefit of mankind;

4. Requests the states participating in the negotiations to report to the United Nations as soon as sufficient progress has been achieved in the establishment of the agency;

5. Recommends that the agency, once it is established, should negotiate an appropriate form of agreement with the United Nations in order to develop an efficient working relationship between the agency and the United Nations.

B. Concerning an international conference on the peaceful uses of atomic energy

1. Declares the interest and concern of the United Nations in helping in every feasible way to promote the peaceful applications of nuclear energy;

2. Decides that an international conference of government representatives should be held under the auspices of the United Nations, to explore means of developing the peaceful uses of atomic energy and, in particular, to consider the technical areas — such as biology, medicine, health, physics, fundamental science, and nuclear power — in which international cooperation might most effectively be accomplished;

3. Invites all state members of the United Nations, UNESCO, FAO and WHO, to participate in the conference and to include among their representatives experts competent in the atomic energy field;

4. Establishes an Advisory Committee composed of representatives of Canada, France, United Kingdom, United States and _____ (if possible not more than three other states giving adequate geographic representation) to advise the Secretary-General on the calling, the organization and participation in the international conference;

5. Requests the Secretary-General of the United Nations, upon the advice of the Advisory Committee, to issue invitations to this conference, to prepare and circulate to all invitees a detailed agenda, and to provide the necessary staff and services;

6. Invites the heads of interested specialized agencies to designate persons to represent them at the conference;

7. Suggests that the international scientific conference should be held no later than August 1955 at a place to be determined by the Secretary-General and the Advisory Committee;

8. Requests that the Secretary-General circulate a report on the results of this conference to all members of the United Nations and to all other governments and the specialized agencies participating in the conference, for their information.

2. We also considered the possibility of adding at a later stage in the debate, if discussion showed that some concessions were necessary:

(a) The following paragraph to part "A" of the resolution:

"Transmits to the states participating in the creation of the agency for their careful consideration, the record of the discussion of this item at the present session of the General Assembly and, in particular, the various suggestions made concerning the agency".

(b) The following paragraph to part "B" of the resolution between paragraphs 4 and 5 of the present text:

"Recommends that the Advisory Committee should consult as appropriate with representatives of UNESCO, FAO and WHO".

3. The text of the resolution as given above is the one that emerged from our morning's work among the 4 delegations and represents a number of improvements, from our point of view, in the original United States draft which included, for example the words "through international cooperation" in paragraph 2 of part "B" of the resolution, suggesting that an international conference might not be kept separate from the negotiations for the establishment of the international atomic energy agency.

4. The reference to UNESCO, FAO and WHO in part "B" of the resolution have been tentatively included

(a) to define indirectly which countries (e.g., Communist China, East Germany, Outer Mongolia, North Korea, Vietminh) would not be invited, and

(b) to meet strong French representations in favour of not by-passing UNESCO and the other specialized agencies directly concerned.

It is for this reason that the supplementary paragraph which might be added to part "B" is being considered.

5. In this connection, the French and United Kingdom delegations told us that, because of the UNESCO conference meeting in Montevideo, I believe next week, the Latin American group have agreed to take issue with the western powers if UNESCO is excluded from a hand in the conference which they think they should be asked to organize. This would, of course, be anathema to the United States but the French delegation could not oppose a Latin amendment in this sense. The supplementary paragraph is, therefore, intended as a compromise on the basis of which the probable sponsors could keep together on amendments urging the participation of UNESCO.

6. As regards the membership of the Advisory Committee, it was tentatively agreed this morning that Brazil, India and probably the USSR should be included, the latter only if their attitude to the conference and the agency seemed reasonably cooperative. The United Kingdom also suggested that New Zealand might be added to the Advisory Committee but this did not meet with any response.

7. As we are being asked to co-sponsor a resolution along the lines of the text discussed this morning, we should appreciate your comments and instructions early next week.

INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY

At this morning's meeting of the United Kingdom, United States, French and Canadian delegations, we also discussed how far we should go in outlining to the First Committee next week the ideas of our governments on the negotiation of an Atomic Energy Agency together with its general character and functions. It soon transpired that the French (who had not been in on last week's talks in Washington and had not seen Lodge's draft statement) thought it would be best to avoid giving any details publicly as to the type of Agency we hope to negotiate. They opposed saying anything about whether the Agency should be established as a bank (along the lines of the March 19 memorandum) or as a broker, or as a broker which might develop towards a bank in certain contingencies (if the Russians should decide to participate).

2. At this morning's meeting (and more specifically since receiving your telegram under reference), we passed on your comments on the subject matter of statements to be made by the four delegations in opening up the debate. We added that we thought, judging from the reports we had received from Washington, that there was general agreement among our four governments as to the character of the Agency we wanted and that it was desirable to say as much as we could without getting into areas on which there might be important differences of view as between the four. We were supported on this opinion by the United Kingdom delegation.

3. After a good deal of discussion we suggested that until we could all see a draft of what Mr. Lodge proposed to say upon this subject, we could not usefully carry our discussions further. It was agreed that the United States delegation would send each of us as soon as possible the revised draft of their statement.

4. There seems to be a real danger that, because of inadequate consultation with the French, the statements of the other three delegations may have to be less specific as to the type of Agency we are aiming to negotiate than we had hoped. This would be regrettable from the point of view of Assembly debate since even the present outline as agreed by the United States, United Kingdom and Canada will be received with some disappointment by countries who had hoped for an Agency like that of the March 19 memorandum. If the western powers are to get any credit from this debate, I think we should try to get agreement among the four to be as specific as the first draft of Lodge's speech which you have.

5. Certainly the present situation has the United States delegation worried. They are aware that India and others may try to have the debate postponed for a period of digestion after the sponsoring powers have introduced their proposal. In any case, no amount of manoeuvring will, in our opinion, succeed in persuading the Assembly to focus its attention upon the Scientific Conference, as the United States have been hoping, and leave the question of the Agency to the wisdom of the sponsoring powers.

6. I think our objective in the forthcoming debate, therefore, should be to say as much as we can about the proposed Agency without embarrassing our friends, to allow a full discussion of these very tentative proposals which are still subject to negotiation, and to conclude with a resolution such as the one we discussed among the four delegations this morning. This would, I think, leave the Assembly with the impression that the organizing powers had taken the Assembly somewhat into their confidence by outlining what they hoped to negotiate. In so doing, the organizing powers would not however be relinquishing any control whatever over the actual negotiations. On the other hand, if we say very little about our objective and merely explain, as the French would like, that since the matter is under negotiation we cannot talk about it, we run the risk that the under-developed countries will try to fill the vacuum by putting forward their own resolution.

7. It was, after all the United States Government which decided to put this item on the Assembly's agenda, with no encouragement from the United Kingdom or Canada, and I think we may all have reason to regret the decision unless our future tactics are very carefully handled. It is perhaps not an exaggeration to say the item the United States psychological warriors have been building up as the "big thing" of this Assembly may turn out to be an embarrassing anti-climax.

INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY

It is gratifying to see the gradual emergence of a more tangible joint approach to what is likely to lie ahead now that the U.S. has precipitated Assembly discussion on this subject. Like you, however, we feel that unless this process is accelerated the kudos which the United States has relished in anticipation may turn into a harvest of suspicion and bad feeling.

2. To help avoid this regrettable possibility we agree that our objective in the debate should be to say as much as we can about the trend of our thinking without provoking disagreement with our friends. We do not understand why the French wish to be vague and we do not see why the other interested powers should have to follow an unfortunate example of this kind.

3. In this connection while the resolution (your telegram No. 375 of October 29) seems unobjectionable, we anticipate that the fact that no mention has been made of the countries which are to participate in the negotiations envisaged, may provoke unfavourable comment. We doubt that countries like India, for example, will be content to hear the negotiators' names restated to them in Lodge's speech. Presumably this procedure is thought to be unavoidable if the initiative and control over the establishment of the Agency are to remain with us. If this is so, we think that the least that should be done to make this palatable to outside countries would be to emphasize that Lodge's justification for restricting the countries to be included in the initial negotiations is both reasonable and logical.

4. Debate on this aspect of the resolution may well lead into some discussion of the eventual membership of the Agency and it may be difficult to put Assembly inquisitiveness on this score off with the generalities in Lodge's statement which seem to leave the question of membership to the sole decision of the negotiating countries. In order to be prepared to meet such a contingency there would be merit in working out a concerted answer with the other main delegations, which might allay any worries there may be. It might, perhaps, even be desirable to enunciate a tentative formula for membership, subject to the eventual outcome of the negotiations on establishment. A suitable formula to take account of the difficulty over Portugal might include as a matter of right any negotiating country or any member of the United Nations willing to accept the relevant responsibilities. The formula might also include provision for the election of other countries. Obviously we would hope that the debate would not turn to policy questions of this kind, especially when there has been insufficient time to consider their full implications. On the other hand we should seek to place ourselves in a position to rise to any occasion that may face us.

5. As we have said before, we fear that the lumping of the atomic energy agency and the proposed international scientific conference together in one resolution may open the door to over-concern by the scientists with the establishment of the Agency. The objections to this would, of course, be increased if, as seems likely, it should become necessary to insert an extra paragraph recommending that the Advisory Committee should consult, as appropriate, UNESCO, FAO and WHO. We are sending you separately a summary of our instructions† to our Delegation to the UNESCO Conference on the draft resolution submitted by India which seems to envisage intimate concern by UNESCO with international co-operation in the field of atomic energy. In our view it would be desirable in your statement to do what you can to emphasize that these are related but nonetheless separate exercises.

6. We should be grateful for any comments which you might wish to make on the above observations which we know you will wish to discuss with the other interested delegations. However, despite these misgivings, we think that the resolution is, generally speaking, a good one. In the light of these comments we would be prepared to recommend co-sponsorship to the Minister, but before seeking final authority would wish to know which other proposed negotiating governments are also co-sponsoring the resolution.

7. If any additional thoughts should occur to us after this matter has been discussed in the Advisory Panel on Atomic Energy we shall, of course, notify you. In the meantime please let us know when and at what stage of the debate the draft resolution is expected to be tabled and when your own statement will likely be made. Ends.

PEACEFUL USES OF ATOMIC ENERGY

The 7 delegations met again with Lodge this afternoon. Some editorial improvements were made in the draft resolution. The text as it now stands is given in our immediately following message.

2. Lodge said that he thought it was important, to maintain the momentum of this item, to have the resolution submitted in time to catch the Sunday papers. However, when it became clear that South Africa could probably not secure instructions before Sunday, it was agreed that the 7 delegations should aim at submitting the resolution on Sunday unless the South African delegation can get instructions earlier.

3. After it became clear that all delegations present except South Africa could agree to co-sponsor, I indicated that we could too.

PEACEFUL USES OF ATOMIC ENERGY

At his suggestion, I had a long talk this morning with the Secretary-General about the establishment of the international atomic energy agency and the organization of the international scientific conference.

2. Mr. Hammarskjöld explained that he wanted to talk to me very informally and on a personal basis. He had not, he said, discussed his personal views on this subject with anyone outside his top advisors in the secretariat except one member of the Norwegian delegation.

3. Not unnaturally the Secretary-General's main concern was that the atomic energy agency should not be set up in such a way that it was in fact outside the United Nations, even though it might in name be a United Nations agency. By way of illustration, he observed that although his own relations with Black were good, neither the Secretary-General nor any of the principal organs of the United Nations had any control whatever over the International Bank. Clearly, he did not favour that type of relationship.

4. The problem was, he thought, both complex and new. There was no reason why this venture should be made to conform to the old pattern of the specialized agencies. Indeed, he thought there was much to be said for establishing any agency with such great potentialities as an additional principal organ of the United Nations. It would, he considered, be inappropriate to have the new agency report to ECOSOC and he agreed that it was politically undesirable to set it up as a subsidiary of the Security Council, although its importance would justify such a position. He therefore thought that the agency should report directly to the General Assembly where all members would have an opportunity to review the agency's reports annually. He did not, however, make clear what powers, if any, he thought the assembly should have in directing or supervising the policies of the agency. As I understood him, he conceived of the agency's relationship to the assembly as fulfilling the political function of giving all members a sense of participation, without allowing the numerical majority to direct the operations of the agency, although it is clear from his comments on the International Bank's loose relationship that he would like to see the atomic energy agency much more closely tied in than the Bank with the United Nations itself. As he said, he is more interested in the substance than in the form.

5. He realizes that at the present early stage of negotiations, the sponsoring countries could not commit themselves to any specific relationship. He did however, with some diffidence, give me the two following paragraphs which he thought might be added to the seven-power resolution in order to keep the door open for the constitutional relationship he thinks would be desirable: Text Begins,

Recognising the desirability that the agency, under the aegis of the United Nations, make the fullest possible contribution towards the achievement of the purposes of the United Nations, Recommends that an appropriate relationship be established, by agreement, between this agency and (the principal organs of) the United Nations. Text Ends. The Secretary-General would be prepared to drop the words in brackets if they caused any difficulty for the sponsors, and in that event agreed that the principal organ should be designated as the Assembly.

6. The Secretary-General also discussed with me his role in organizing the scientific conference. He was not sure about the creation of an advisory committee to assist him in carrying out his responsibilities under the seven-power resolution, but since the suggestion had now been made, he would not oppose it.

7. He did, however, hope that consideration might be given to adding Norway to the Advisory Committee. He has been much impressed with Dr. [Gunnar] Randers, the Director of the Norwegian-Netherlands Atomic Energy Establishment and Vice-President of the European Atomic Energy Society. I gathered from Randers (whom I met later in the day) that if Norway were added to the Advisory Committee, he would be their representative and would endeavour to present the strong preference of most European atomic scientists for a smaller conference with a more specific agenda than that which has been contemplated by Admiral Strauss.

8. As regards procedure in the present debate, the Secretary-General thought that there would likely be a short suspension of discussion, perhaps a day or two, if as now seems to be expected, the USSR agree in principle to participate in the scientific conference and possibly the agency as well.

9. Although I expressed interest in the Secretary-General's ideas on both the agency and the conference, I was carefully non-committal, saying that I wanted to discuss these suggestions with you over the weekend.

PEACEFUL USES OF ATOMIC ENERGY

The following is the U.S.S.R. delegation's "unofficial translation" of five amendments to the seven-power draft resolution which was delivered by Soviet messenger this evening. Begins:

1. Add after the first paragraph of preamble the following paragraph: "seeking to promote by all means the uses of great inventions in the atomic energy field for peaceful ends only for the benefit of peoples and for the amelioration of their living conditions".

2. Add as the first paragraph of the operative part "A" the following paragraph: "Recommends that the corresponding states should continue negotiations with the aim to come to an agreement in the field of international cooperation in the peaceful uses of atomic energy".

3. Numerate the paragraphs 1, 2, 3 of the operative part "A" correspondingly as 2, 3, 4.

4. Paragraph 1 of the operative part "A" so re-numbered as paragraph 2 to read as follows: "2. Recommends that the agency should be established as an agency responsible to the General Assembly and in the cases provided for by the Charter of the United Nations to the Security Council".

5. Paragraph 2 of the part "B" to read as follows:

"3. Invites all states members of the United Nations and of the specialized agencies as well as all other states which will express their desire to participate in the conference and to include among their representatives individual experts competent in the atomic energy field". Ends.

PEACEFUL USES OF ATOMIC ENERGY — SOVIET AMENDMENTS

The seven sponsoring delegations met briefly after the First Committee to consider our first reactions to the Soviet amendments which had just been handed to us by the Soviet delegation following the meeting. The text of these amendments is given in our immediately preceding message.

2. Although Lodge made it evident that he was disinclined to consider any of the amendments very seriously and that he thought they were all intended as delaying devices, most of the other delegations represented seemed to feel that we should make at least some effort to meet the Soviet point of view where we could without compromising our own principles or delaying the setting up of the agency. Although nobody seemed very hopeful about securing a unanimous resolution, the possibility exists and in any case the joint draft resolution is bound to secure a larger vote if the sponsors react reasonably to Soviet suggestions since we all would prefer to secure Soviet participation in the agency.⁴³

3. The first Soviet amendment looked innocuous but when Nutting and Lodge thought it might be interpreted as endorsing the Soviet prohibition of the use of atomic weapons, Moch suggested we should simply substitute the corresponding paragraph from the disarmament resolution which has already been accepted by the Soviet Union.

4. On the second Soviet amendment Lodge explained that Vyshinsky had indicated that "by corresponding states": he meant the United States and the U.S.S.R. Moch rather ingeniously suggested that if the Soviet second amendment were added as the second paragraph (rather than the first paragraph) of the operative part of part "A" of the resolution it could only be read as sanctioning the continuation of negotiations among the eight powers, and, possibly the Soviet Union. In other words the assembly would not then be directing the eight powers to wait for the United States and the U.S.S.R. to agree.

5. The fourth and fifth Soviet amendments were generally regarded as unacceptable. However to meet in part the point of the fourth Soviet amendment, it was suggested by the Belgian, French and Canadian representatives that the final words of each first paragraph ("similar to those of the specialized agencies") might be dropped. This would leave the precise type of relationship vague, not prejudging the issue as requested by Vyshinsky.⁴⁴

6. The fifth Soviet amendment seemed, to all of us, unacceptable as it would mean inviting Communist China.⁴⁵

7. Nutting also suggested adding the following paragraph to mollify those delegations who now feel they are being completely left out of the negotiations for setting up the agency. The wording he suggested for a final paragraph of part "A" of the joint resolution was as follows:

"Suggests that those member states which have indicated their interest be consulted at an appropriate stage in these negotiations in order that their views may be fully taken into account". The Canadian representative supported this suggestion.

8. We should be grateful for your instructions on the above amendments, none of which have been officially tabled. We are to have a further meeting of the seven delegations after Monday afternoon's session of the First Committee.

PEACEFUL USES OF ATOMIC ENERGY

We agree with you that, although the prospects of securing a unanimous resolution are not very bright, it would be sound tactics for the sponsors to react reasonably to the Soviet suggestions.

2. Our comments on the Soviet amendments are as follows:

Soviet Amendment (1): While the British and American suspicion of the underlying Soviet intention in putting forward this amendment may be somewhat farfetched, we agree that it is probably desirable to avoid inclusion of a provision of this kind. We are at a loss to follow Moch's suggestion to use the corresponding paragraph from the disarmament resolution since none of the paragraphs in that resolution seem to us to be either appropriate or relevant.

Soviet Amendment (2): If there is any possibility that Lodge's explanation of the term "corresponding states" is accurate, the amendment should be opposed. We do not think Moch's suggestion, though ingenious, meets the situation on all scores. Even if it would have the effect of avoiding the need to wait for United States and Soviet agreement (which is by no means certain), it would still be open to the objection that it would simply be spelling out what is already implicit in the draft resolution, and might make it difficult for the Soviet Union to accept the resolution since it would be endorsing explicitly the negotiations already in train.

Soviet Amendments (4) and (5): We agree that these amendments are unacceptable but we also agree that it would be in order for you to concur in dropping the words "similar to those of the specialized agencies".

3. We agree with the suggestion put forward by Nutting that a paragraph might be added to the resolution to mollify those delegations who now feel they are being completely left out of the negotiations for setting up the agency. The wording suggested by Nutting is agreeable to us.

PEACEFUL USES OF ATOMIC ENERGY

I can understand, if I cannot share, the Secretary-General's personal predilection for an atomic energy agency closely associated with the United Nations. I cannot, however, follow his arguments that it would be possible to create a new principal organ which would, on the one hand, give all members of the United Nations a sense of participation, without, on the other hand, allowing the numerical majority a controlling voice in the agency's operation. As I understand it, it would be impossible to create a new principal organ in the sense of paragraph 1 of Article 7 without amending the Charter, which would not only afford the Assembly an opportunity to assert control but would open the establishment of the agency to the veto. Even if Mr. Hammarskjöld is really only thinking of a subsidiary organ of the General Assembly as under Article 22, there is still the objection that the majority of United Nations members could assume control during the course of establishment.

2. I am further confused by the Secretary-General's suggested new paragraph which seems to envisage that the agency is to be established by the countries most concerned and that thereafter an appropriate relationship with the United Nations will be worked out by means of agreement with the General Assembly. I do not see how this procedure would create either a principal or a subsidiary organ. It seems to me that the only thing the proposed new paragraphs would do would be to delete specific reference to the eventual creation of a specialized agency relationship and leave the door open for a way around reporting through ECOSOC. Why does the Secretary-General consider that it would be inappropriate for the agency to report through ECOSOC? Surely to do so will still afford the Assembly the opportunity of discussing the agency's annual report.

3. From the outset we have thought that control over the establishment and eventual operation of the agency should remain with the limited number of countries most intimately concerned. Furthermore, as you know, we have anticipated that for some years to come the role of the agency would be a relatively modest one and to give it a special relationship to U.N. would, in our judgement, be misleading since it would give the impression that it would be able to play a much larger part in the development of the peaceful uses of atomic energy than it will, in fact, be able to do. Accordingly, you should offer no encouragement to the Secretary-General to think that we would support any closer relationship with the U.N. than that of a specialized agency similar to the International Bank and we should not be prepared to go along with his suggested amendment.

4. I think, however, that his suggestion to include Norway on the Advisory Committee for the International Scientific Conference is a reasonable one and you may indicate to the other sponsoring delegations that we are prepared to support its inclusion.

5. In discussing this matter further with the Secretary-General you might wish to indicate my doubts as to the practicability of his scheme as I understand it and to seek further clarification of what he has in mind, which may remove some of those doubts. You might also indicate our appreciation that the Secretary-General has taken us into his confidence in respect of his own views in this matter. I hope to get to New York shortly and to have the privilege of discussing this and other matters with him.

PEACEFUL USES OF ATOMIC ENERGY

Following this afternoon's meeting of the first committee, the seven sponsoring delegations met to discuss the amendments Vyshinsky had given us on Friday (our telegram No. 518 of November 12).

2. Lodge explained that it was his intention to see Vyshinsky tonight and tell him what the sponsoring group could and could not accept. He did not wish to become involved in negotiations with Vyshinsky and was unwilling to discuss what alternative wording we might fall back on if Vyshinsky did not agree to our counter-proposals.

3. In brief, for reasons which you will readily appreciate, the sponsors decided to reject the fifth Soviet amendment (regarding participation of all states in the scientific conference) and to propose the following changes in the joint resolution to meet his other points:

(a) Add after the first paragraph of the preamble the following: "Desiring to promote the use of atomic energy to serve the peaceful pursuits of mankind and to ameliorate their living conditions".

(b) Add as the fourth paragraph of operative part "A", the following: "Suggests that the present negotiations should continue with the aim to come to an agreement in the field of international cooperation in the peaceful uses of atomic energy".

(c) Amend the present first operative paragraph of part "A" by deleting the words "similar to those of the specialized agencies".

4. We also discussed the Secretary-General's suggestions which he had given to the United Kingdom, United States and French delegates as well as to me (our telegram No. 504 of November 11). He had meanwhile added a third paragraph to the other two which would read as follows: "Suggests that consultations be held with the Secretary-General on legal or constitutional issues arising in anticipation of the agreement to be concluded by the United Nations and the agency".

5. Although Lodge saw no great objection to the first two paragraphs proposed by the Secretary-General, we all quickly agreed that the third (quoted above) should not be written into the resolution but such consultations would in practice take place informally.

6. As regards the second, I made the points indicated in your telegram No. 271 and then suggested that we kill two birds with one stone by using the modified language of operative paragraph 1 of part "A" (deleting "similar to those of the specialized agencies") to meet not only Vyshinsky but also the Secretary-General. This was agreed.

7. The Secretary-General's first paragraph could have been accepted as it stood but South Africa objected to the word "achievement" which was therefore replaced by "towards the principles and purposes of the United Nations".

8. Nutting's amendment regarding consultation was discussed briefly. I supported it but as Moch had received instructions to oppose it, we dropped it for the time being.

9. As regards the membership of the Advisory Committee of the scientific conference, Lodge and I raised the Secretary-General's interest in Norway being added, but the majority clearly felt it was better to hold the line as the addition of one more would probably involve adding at least half a dozen. It was, however, agreed that the Secretary-General should be encouraged to consult Dr. Randers of Norway on technical problems instead of adding him to the Advisory Committee.

10. Lodge is to report to the sponsoring group tomorrow morning on his talk this evening with Vyshinsky but I doubt whether Vyshinsky will say very much before he gets instructions.

PEACEFUL USES OF ATOMIC ENERGY

After this morning's meeting of the First Committee, Lodge told Vyshinsky that he would like, if possible to have the latter's comments on the counter proposals of the sponsors by 3 p.m. this afternoon. Lodge then called a meeting of the seven sponsoring delegations for 4:30 p.m.

2. As he had evidently not yet received his instructions, Vyshinsky did not get in touch with Lodge this afternoon. The sponsoring group therefore considered possible amendments in the light of Vyshinsky's preliminary comments to Lodge on November 15 and in the light of the suggestions which Menon had made in committee this morning. Lodge said in no uncertain terms that he did not regard himself as negotiating with Vyshinsky and, with Spender's emphatic support, added that he did not think we should wait indefinitely for Vyshinsky to give us his considered views. In fact, Lodge and Spender proposed that the sponsors should submit their revised draft resolution without further ado since in their opinion, Vyshinsky was not waiting for instructions but merely stalling and like Micawber "hoping for something to turn up."

3. Moch, Nutting and I took a different view. We maintained that our objective in this matter was to secure an unanimous resolution if we could do so without giving way on any of our basic principles. I said that I thought that to submit the revisions without giving Vyshinsky at least a little longer to respond to our counter proposals would not be in harmony with the prevailing mood of the committee at this session. When Moch raised the question of Soviet co-sponsorship, Nutting doubted whether we should "try too hard" although it was generally agreed if Vyshinsky asked to co-sponsor we should accept his offer.

4. After a good deal of discussion, it was agreed that Lodge would send a copy of the revised draft resolution in its present form to Vyshinsky this evening and would see Vyshinsky in the morning, reporting to the sponsoring group what transpires.

5. The text which Lodge will give Vyshinsky is substantially the text you have. Part B is unchanged, except for the addition of the words "of governments" after "international technical conference" in paragraph 2. The preamble and part A have however been amended to read as follows (new language underlined). Text begins:

The General Assembly,

Believing that the benefits arising from the momentous discovery of atomic energy should be placed at the service of mankind,

Desiring to promote energetically the use of atomic energy to serve the peaceful pursuits of mankind and to ameliorate their living conditions,

Recognizing the importance and the urgency of international cooperation in developing and expanding the peaceful uses of atomic energy to assist in lifting the burdens of hunger, poverty and disease,

Believing also that all nations should cooperate in promoting the dissemination of knowledge in the realm of nuclear technology for peaceful ends.

A

Concerning an international atomic energy agency recalling the initiative of the President of the United States embodied in his address of December 8, 1953,

Noting that negotiations are in progress and the intentional that they should continue for the establishment as quickly as possible of an international atomic energy agency to facilitate the use by the entire world of atomic energy for peaceful purposes, and to encourage international cooperation in the further development and practical application of atomic energy for the benefit of mankind,

Recognizing the desirability that the agency, under the aegis of the United Nations, make the fullest possible contribution towards the principles and purposes of the United Nations,

1. Expresses the hope that the international atomic energy agency will be established without delay.

2. Suggests that, once the agency is established, it negotiate an appropriate form of agreement with the United Nations;

3. Transmits to the states participating in the creation of the agency, for their careful consideration, the record of the discussion of this item at the present session of the General Assembly;

4. Suggests that members of the United Nations be informed as progress is achieved in the establishment of the agency; and that the views of members who have manifested their interest be fully considered. Text ends.

PEACEFUL USES OF ATOMIC ENERGY

At a meeting of the sponsoring powers this morning, Lodge told us that he had presented Vyshinsky last night with the text of the amended resolution as given in our telegram under reference. This morning Vyshinsky had offered the following three amendments:

(a) In the second paragraph of the preamble, that the word "only" be inserted after the word "serve";

(b) To delete the final paragraph of the preamble of Part A, commencing "recognizing the desirability";

(c) In paragraph 3 of Part B, that the words "as well as all other states which will express their desire" be inserted after the words "specialized agencies".

2. Lodge said that as far as he was concerned he thought Vyshinsky's amendment (b) was acceptable but he was opposed to (a) and (c). We all readily agreed that (c) was unacceptable, even though Vyshinsky had not mentioned China and had confined himself to urging that East Germany, Outer Mongolia, North Korea, etc, be invited to the conference.

3. As regards (a), Lodge found himself alone among the seven in opposing the acceptance of the addition of "only". The rest of us argued that although we did not much like the addition, we had frequently expressed similar hopes before and it would be more embarrassing to oppose this amendment than to accept it. Finally, after an interval for consultation with Washington, Lodge was able to agree to amend the second paragraph of the preamble to read as follows: "Desiring to promote energetically the use of atomic energy to the end that it will serve only the peaceful pursuits of mankind and to ameliorate their living conditions".

4. As regards (b), opinions were divided. Spender thought it would be difficult for Vyshinsky to make a public case for opposing this language. Lodge explained that Vyshinsky's objection was principally to the word "aegis". Nutting wished to retain the paragraph since this was the only one of the Secretary-General's suggestions the sponsors had accepted but when it was pointed out that Vyshinsky might try to substitute for "under the aegis of the United Nations" some closer link with the United Nations and the Security Council in particular, the sponsors agreed to drop the whole paragraph and explain to the Secretary-General that we were doing so in the interests of reaching agreement with the USSR.

5. Lodge will now inform Vyshinsky that we can accept, in effect, two of his three amendments. The revised seven power resolution will be tabled when the First Committee meet again at three o'clock this afternoon, when Lodge, on behalf of the sponsors, will explain the revisions we have made to meet Vyshinsky, Menon and others.

6. We expect to vote on the resolution tomorrow and there seems a good chance that although Vyshinsky will be unable to support paragraph 3 of part B, he should be able to vote for the resolution as a whole.

PEACEFUL USES OF ATOMIC ENERGY

The revised 7-Power resolution was tabled in committee one this afternoon. Lodge spoke shortly and on behalf of the sponsors explained the reasons behind each of the alterations. He also said that the U.S.S.R.'s suggestion for inviting "all states" to the conference had not been acceptable to the sponsors.

2. Lodge was followed by Vyshinsky who spoke in a conciliatory tone and echoed Lodge's remarks about the agreed changes in the resolution. Vyshinsky introduced an amendment to cover his suggestion (C) contained in our telegram under reference. In support of this amendment he quoted statements from Dulles and Lodge saying that all nations should participate in the conference.

3. The representative of Brazil made a brief statement in which he said that his country would be happy to take part in the work of the Advisory Committee.

4. The delegate of Peru then said that since there was agreement among the great powers there was no reason for any further debate. He did, however, take the opportunity to say that he felt that no region of the world should be excluded from the work of the agency and that regional centres for the peaceful uses of atomic energy should be established.

At this point there was considerable discussion about procedure. Both the United States and the U.S.S.R. said they were prepared to vote but Menon interposed and said that because the great powers were agreed was no reason to assume that other countries did not have something to say. He did not find that the amendments completely satisfied his suggestions. The whole continent of Asia was not represented in the negotiations. He felt that the amended resolution required deep consideration and he was not sure that he would be ready to vote even tomorrow, when according to the rules of procedure a vote would be called. He could not expect to receive instructions before Monday. It was evident that Menon was not in a happy mood and was not prepared to make any concessions to the committee.

5. After further discussion it was decided on Lodge's motion to adjourn until 4:00 p.m. tomorrow. At this time the committee will meet to resume debate and when that is concluded, to vote on the Soviet amendment and the 7-Power resolution.

4. PEACEFUL USES OF ATOMIC ENERGY

Defence Liaison (1) Division: The debate in Committee One of the United Nations General Assembly on the peaceful uses of atomic energy ended on November 23 when the Committee adopted unanimously a resolution co-sponsored by the United States, the United Kingdom, Canada, France, Belgium, South Africa and Australia. In brief, the resolution expressed the hope that the international atomic energy agency would be established without delay and suggested that once the agency was established it should negotiate an appropriate form of agreement with the United Nations. The resolution also provided for the holding of an international technical conference of governments, to take place during the summer of 1955. Arrangements for the conference are to be made by the Secretary-General of the United Nations, acting on the advice of a small advisory committee composed of representatives of France, the United Kingdom, the United States, Canada, Brazil, India and the Soviet Union.

Now that the United Nations debate is over the United States will no doubt resume discussions with the other co-sponsors of the resolution, the Soviet Union and Portugal, with a view to reaching agreement on a convention to govern the establishment of the international agency. It remains to be seen whether the United Nations debate will have had the effect of making the negotiations with the Soviet Union more fruitful than heretofore.

UNITED NATIONS; PROPOSED INTERNATIONAL FINANCE CORPORATION

19. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that, following the decision at the meeting of September 8th, 1954, the Canadian delegation now attending the Ninth Session of the General Assembly of the United Nations had been instructed to indicate that Canada had been willing to support an International Finance Corporation under the management of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. Since neither the United States nor the United Kingdom had been prepared to support the proposal at that time, Canada had not gone beyond indicating positive interest in it.

The U.S. had recently reconsidered its rather negative attitude and the U.S. Secretary of the Treasury had, on November 11th, announced that the Administration would seek Congressional approval for U.S. participation in the establishment of this Corporation. Although it had originally been suggested that the total capitalization of I.F.C. be the equivalent of $400 million, Mr. Humphrey had now suggested that the Corporation's authorized capital be $100 million and that the subscription of each member country should be in proportion to that member's stock in the International Bank.

The U.S. view was that the Corporation should not directly provide equity financing. It should, however, be empowered to hold securities bearing interest payable only if earned, as well as debentures convertible into stock when purchased from the Corporation by private investors. In that way, it would operate in the area of venture capital without holding equity right of control. It would not compete with either the International Bank itself or the Export-Import Bank.

Mr. Humphrey had emphasized that the operation of such a corporation would, of necessity, have to be experimental and subject to review from time to time. Its success would depend upon its effectiveness in stimulating an increased international movement of private funds.

The U.K. government had not yet commented on the new proposal and the U.K. delegation in New York had been asked to try to get further discussion postponed so that there might be time to give further thought to the matter. The Canadian High Commissioner in London had indicated, however, that the U.K. Treasury conceded that, if the idea of equity financing through the proposed corporation had been abandoned, the scheme might be "a little less unsound" than it was before. The U.K.'s lack of enthusiasm for the proposal stemmed, at least in part, from reluctance to draw further on the limited funds available for spending abroad. However, if enough countries were now in favour of the I.F.C. to ensure its creation, it might be difficult for the U.K. to stay out — both for political reasons and in order to protect or increase markets for U.K. capital goods abroad.

It was probable that the U.S. decision to support early establishment of the Corporation stemmed partly from the expectation that the U.S. would be under increased pressure for economic assistance to Latin American countries at the forthcoming conference of the Organization of American States in Rio de Janeiro. While this consideration did not affect Canada as directly as it affected the U.S., it would seem desirable to acquaint the Canadian observer at Rio with present Canadian views on the proposed Corporation before the Conference opened so that he might mention, informally, that Canada favoured the proposal. This would offset the negative attitude Canada would probably adopt toward many of the topics to be discussed at Rio.

The proposed Corporation was a more modest and immediately manageable project than the proposed Special United Nations Fund for Economic Development (S.U.N.F.E.D.). It would no doubt be expected to serve underdeveloped countries in many parts of the world, but some benefit would likely accrue to Asian countries which Canada was assisting under the Colombo Plan. India had established an Industrial Finance Corporation and Pakistan and Ceylon might follow suit. The activities of I.F.C. would usefully supplement the work of such corporations in stimulating and assisting private investment. There might be political, as well as economic advantages in supporting the proposal. While pressure for S.U.N.F.E.D. would no doubt continue even if the Corporation was established, Canadian opposition would be more readily understood by the underdeveloped countries than it would if Canada did not support I.F.C.

On the basis of a Corporation capitalized at $100 million and a Canadian contribution in the same ratio as the Canadian contribution to the International Bank, the cost to Canada would probably be between $3 million and $4 million. This money might not have to be found before the fiscal year 1956-57, but it might at least have to be pledged during the coming fiscal year.

In view of the recent change of heart on the part of the U.S. Administration and because of Canada's long standing support of this proposal, he now recommended that Canada participate in the proposed International Finance Corporation on the understanding that the Canadian commitment to subscribe to the capital of the corporation would not be significantly different, in proportion, from that applicable to the International Bank and would not, in any event, involve a subscription in excess of $5 million during 1955-56.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, Nov. 17, 1954 — Cab. Doc. 246-54)†

20. The Cabinet,

(a) approved in principle Canadian participation in a proposed International Finance Corporation to be established, under the management of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, for the purpose of helping to finance productive private enterprise in underdeveloped areas through loans without government guarantees; and,

(b) approved Canada undertaking to subscribe to the capital of the Corporation, in a proportion not substantially different from Canada's share in the subscriptions to the International Bank, and in an amount not larger than $5 million.

Note du ministère des Finances
Memorandum by Department of Finance

[Ottawa], December 9, 1954

INTERNATIONAL FINANCE CORPORATION — DISCUSSION AT UNITED NATIONS
DECEMBER 4, 1954

Attached herewith is Resolution L249 sponsored by a group of countries (including the United States and Canada).⁴⁶ This resolution was designed to replace a resolution put forward by a large group of under-developed countries earlier in the General Assembly and before the United States had decided to support the idea of an IFC.

The new resolution requests the International Bank to prepare draft statutes to govern the Corporation to present the draft to member governments of the Bank for discussion and invite them to indicate the support that may be expected from them in providing the capital. The Bank is also requested to take steps to bring about agreement among its members on the statutes and, finally, to report to the Twentieth Session (July, 1955) of the Economic and Social Council. The ECOSOC in turn will report to the next session of the General Assembly.

The Canadian Delegation shared in the preparation of Resolution L249 and in the talks conducted by the United States, the United Kingdom and France and a few others on the one side, with Cuba on the other side representing the under-developed countries. There were two minor issues at stake. The under-developed countries wanted the resolution to affirm, in effect, that the IFC "was a good idea". Cuba's point was that the United Nations has never given formal approval to the idea and they dislike the thought of an IFC coming into existence without the United Nations feeling entitled to take credit for it. The United Kingdom was unwilling to say this, partly because it involved a contradiction of everything it had said in previous discussions about the IFC and partly because their approval of the idea would depend on the ultimate character of the institution. Certain fluffy phrases were placed in the preamble to meet the needs of both parties.

There was some unhappiness on the part of the United States and the other countries of the West at the idea of the Bank's report being presented — as was the wish of the under-developed countries — to the next General Assembly for discussion. In the outcome, it was agreed that the report of the IBRD would go to ECOSOC and ECOSOC would, in the normal course, report thereon to the General Assembly.

It will be noted that the procedure for setting up the IFC, assuming that the Bank can reach agreement on the statutes with its member countries, is left blank. The "developed" countries all recognize the danger of a full-scale discussion of the draft statutes of the Bank in the General Assembly but it has been tacitly agreed to cross that bridge, or to find a way around it, when we come to it.

I was able to stay for only the first day of debate on the IFC. The United Kingdom made a statement which is attached, as did Canada. If Resolution L249 is passed virtually unchanged, it will be up to the Bank to negotiate with its members concerning the character of the IFC. I was advised privately by the Bank's representative that the Bank will very shortly begin to present draft statutes informally and privately to the principal members of the Bank, including Canada. The Bank may have to wrestle with the problem of how to enable non-Bank members to participate in the IFC (e.g., Argentina). I was told privately that the Bank would like to confine membership of the IFC to the members of the Bank. The Bank feels that this will put legitimate pressure on non-members to join the Bank and Fund. In any case the participation of non-Bank members would raise complicated problems. The admission of non-Bank members will make it impossible to preserve intact, for the IFC, the existing representation on the Board of Directors and the existing division of participation with respect to capital subscriptions. The Bank would like to see the IFC operated by the same Board of Directors, and managed by the staff of the Bank under a management arrangement with the IFC. The IFC would have a president different from the president of the IBRD but the president of the IBRD would be the chairman of the Board of Directors of the IFC.

Attached to this file are copies of the speeches made by the representatives of the United States and the United Kingdom. The Canadian statement† will come along later from New York.

P.S. The Second Committee on December 6th approved the resolution without change by a vote of 45 for, none against and five Soviet bloc abstentions.

DELEGATION ASSESSMENT OF THE NINTH GENERAL ASSEMBLY

An analysis of the General Assembly in retrospect is attached, together with an outline for the benefit of those who are interested only in particular aspects of the session.

2. It may be helpful in this covering despatch to refer to a few of the main characteristics of the session.

3. First — a Period of Détente. For two-thirds of the session there was more sweetness and light in evidence than at any time since the first General Assembly met in London nine years ago. Although a number of the older and less important items continued to run in the familiar groves, throughout most of this period the unanimity achieved in the First Committee on disarmament and on the setting up of an Atomic Energy Agency pervaded the other Committees and past controversies were muted in the general chorus of conciliation of which the theme song was co-existence.

4. Second — a Period of Increasing Tension. Before delegates had been able to resolve to their own satisfaction the question of whether the more agreeable face of the new Soviet diplomacy was tactical and temporary or sincere and lasting, the Assembly was pitch-forked back into the cold war. The Soviet group introduced three propaganda items, two of which concerned China. The Chinese Communists themselves, perhaps anticipating and wishing to distort the motives of the forthcoming Treaty between the United States and Nationalist China, set off a furor in the United States by the announcement that they had sentenced eleven United States airmen, who had served the United Nations in Korea, to long prison terms. In short order the case of the American fliers was also brought before the Assembly and a series of angry exchanges and recriminations occurred, while outside the United Nations tension was increasing as ratification of the London and Paris agreements to re-arm Western Germany drew nearer.

5. Nevertheless, the hope generated by the unanimous resolutions on disarmament and atomic energy persisted. As the President of the Assembly said in his closing remarks, these agreements, though procedural, do provide the "essential prerequisites" for successful substantive negotiations. Delegates were acutely conscious of the risks which might be entailed if the Secretary-General failed in his mission to Peking to secure the release of the American airmen. Not only would there be a loss of prestige for the United Nations but it was possible that public opinion in the United States might force the United States Delegation to request members of the United Nations to take some additional action to secure the release of these airmen. On the other hand, it could not be denied that if the Secretary-General succeeded, the prestige of the United Nations would be greatly augmented and an important step would have been taken towards normalizing relations with Communist China, if no fresh provocation were committed. From the point of view of New Delhi, the Assembly's resolution on the fliers might appear singularly unhelpful but given the state of public opinion in the United States the United Nations could hardly have done less.

6. Third — Success of Colonial Powers. During the Ninth Session the colonial powers had a greater measure of success than in any recent session. It was noteworthy that the Netherlands and Australia were able to muster sufficient votes to prevent a resolution acceptable to Indonesia, which had received a majority of more than two-thirds in the First Committee, from receiving the necessary two-thirds majority in Plenary. The United Kingdom and France were each even more successful. The United Kingdom succeeded in having a resolution passed on Cyprus which was acceptable to them. Similarly the resolutions on Tunisia and Morocco were both acceptable to the French Delegation. In the cases of Cyprus, Tunisia and Morocco, friends of the colonial powers found themselves in the unusual position of being begged by the colonial powers to vote for instead of against the resolutions which were eventually passed on these three items. The reason for the success of the colonial powers was partly the United States-United Kingdom co-operation at this Assembly referred to below and partly the increasing caution of the Scandinavian and Latin American members in intervening in this field.

7. Fourth — United States-United Kingdom Co-operation. Behind the headlines, one of the chief features of the session was not the tenuous and superficial détente, for purposes of mutual convenience, between the United States and the USSR, but the solid and real entente, between the United Kingdom and the United States. These two delegations between them invariably have great influence in the United Nations but at this session of the Assembly they achieved a remarkable degree of accommodation and co-ordination which for the first time began to extend beyond East-West issues and into the colonial and economic fields.

8. This unparalleled degree of United States-United Kingdom co-operation was based on practical exigencies. The two delegations badly needed one another's support. Although there was, so far as we are aware, no "deal", both delegations, building on understandings arrived at during Sir Winston Churchill's visit to Washington last summer, supported one another effectively on such otherwise controversial issues as Chinese representation, the case of the United States airmen, and the Cyprus question.

9. Fifth — Personnel Problems. Personnel problems of the Secretariat, which had plagued the two previous General Assemblies and which had tended to separate the United States from its closest friends, seemed to be on the way to a satisfactory solution. The United States Delegation agreed at this Assembly to support the payment of the controversial awards of the Administrative Tribunal to dismissed employees and at the same time obtained a decision in principle of the General Assembly that there should be a judicial review of future awards of the Administrative Tribunal.

10. Sixth — General. Taken as a whole the Assembly seemed to reflect an encouraging slackening of tension and a real desire on both sides to proceed step by step towards mutual accommodations so that the nations of the world might gradually move onto firmer and surer ground instead, as Sir Winston Churchill has recently put it, of "roaming and peering around the brim of hell".

11. At the United Nations, the Great Powers have to put on their Sunday best, for they are paraded before a world public. To some extent, therefore, the agreements arrived at and the sentiments expressed are artificial. Resolutions are worded so that they can be variously interpreted to satisfy fundamentally divergent points of view. This papering over of the cracks is not without value if it fosters the fundamental purpose of the United Nations, of harmonizing conflicting points of view or creating a climate of opinion in which negotiations, whether inside or outside the United Nations, become both possible and fruitful. But in the last analysis, the accomplishments of the present session will be worth little if, when the eyes of the world are turned elsewhere, the Great Powers do not seriously follow up the possibilities which have been opened by the work of this session.

THE NINTH GENERAL ASSEMBLY IN RETROSPECT

Another Assembly is over. Once again procrastinating Committees which had approached their agenda in a leisurely fashion for the first two months of the Session managed somehow to tackle, postpone or otherwise dispose of all their remaining items in the final month, and concluded in time for most Delegates to return to their neglected families for Christmas. In many ways, the Ninth Session which ended on December 17 ran true to form: the last minute rush to finish, the incessant speeches, the ubiquitous press, the receptions, the papers, the weariness. But in more important ways it was different. From the point of view of most participants and for the Canadian Delegation in particular, it was perhaps the most interesting and hopeful session of recent years.

2. Both the interest and the hope were, of course, relative. After the rather stultifying Eighth Session, it had seemed as if nothing of importance could be negotiated in the United Nations, at least not until the problem of Chinese representation had been solved and the Organization had become much more nearly universal in membership. At Berlin, Geneva and elsewhere, the United Nations was being by-passed. United States opinion was becoming increasingly negative towards it. Informal private talks on disarmament among the Five Powers in London had got nowhere and had seemed totally unreal as relations between the East and West worsened over Indo China and Germany.

3. Between June and September, a break in these ominous clouds occurred. The fighting in Indo China was stopped. For the first time a session of the Assembly met in a world at peace — or at least an absence of war.

4. Unknown to each other, both sides in the remaining “cold war” were preparing peaceful initiatives for the Assembly. Despite the lack of enthusiasm of many of his technical officials, President Eisenhower was determined to accept no further delay in carrying his “Atoms for Peace” plan a step further towards the establishment of an International Atomic Energy Agency under the aegis of the United Nations, as he had proposed before the Assembly on December 8 last year. Public opinion throughout the world was becoming sufficiently disturbed by the appalling prospect of thermonuclear warfare that a bold United States initiative to dramatize and develop the peaceful uses of atomic energy had become necessary, whatever the technical complications.

5. At the same time, the USSR, watching Western efforts to wrest agreement from the ashes of E.D.C. on some alternative means of having Western Germany pull its weight in the defence effort of Western Europe, was preparing a new disarmament proposal to present to the Assembly in time to put a spoke in the wheel of French ratification. For, as the French representative on the Disarmament Commission, M. Jules Moch, had long argued, if a measure of actual disarmament could be achieved (or even if there were a reasonable hope of achieving it), German divisions would become unnecessary to redress the military imbalance on the European continent. It was no accident that Mr. Molotov gave an advance copy of the Soviet proposals to the French Ambassador in Moscow.

6. From these two initiatives of the Great Powers, announced in the opening speeches of Mr. Dulles and Mr. Vyshinsky, the Assembly drew hope — hope that was later consolidated by the not inconsiderable achievement of unanimous resolutions on both these subjects, disarmament and "atoms for peace". Though much of the rest of the Assembly was routine, and there were times when we seemed to be back to the "cold-war-as-usual", these two major items gave the Assembly a lift that the United Nations badly needed. No doubt they encouraged many wild and wishful hopes of an approaching golden age of co-existence. General Romulo could carry himself away with a rhetorical vision of "the United Nations energized by the atom". The cautious and shrewd Foreign Minister of Norway, Mr. Lange, affirmed without qualification that the Russians were sincere in their search for a disarmament agreement. As soon as he heard of the Soviet proposals, M. Jules Moch wired his Premier advising him to delay ratification until there had been an opportunity to explore fully the new possibilities of agreement. But even the most conservative assessments conceded that the atmosphere of the Session as a whole was much improved and, whether or not any substantive advances had been made, there were sufficient grounds for hope to make it worthwhile to go on trying to secure Soviet cooperation in a United Nations atomic energy agency, in disarmament and in other efforts to lessen international tension.

7. In this sense, the main accomplishment of the Session may have been the renewed impetus given towards a genuine effort on all fronts to arrive at a modus vivendi that would give meaning to "co-existence". This new sense of direction was strengthened by President Eisenhower's reiterated counsels of moderation, patience and restraint in the face of difficult domestic and foreign pressures and provocations. The same impulse found vigorous expression in the statement and personality of M. Mendes-France who chose the Assembly as the forum for his proposals for a meeting of the Big Four next May to discuss Germany, and perhaps Austria and a European armaments control plan as well.

Disarmament

8. In the disarmament item, the first to be discussed by the Political Committee, the Canadian Delegation was fortuitously pushed into unaccustomed prominence. In the private preliminary discussions among the four main Western Delegations involved (United States, United Kingdom, France and Canada), the main objective was clearly, as one delegate put it, "to keep the French in bed with us".

9. When agreement had been reached on the text of a resolution providing for the reconvening of the Five Power Sub-Committee (United States, United Kingdom, France, Canada and USSR) to seek an acceptable solution and to report as soon as sufficient progress had been made (and not by a fixed date which might give the USSR an Assembly platform during ratification proceedings in Paris), the question of sponsorship arose. The procedure for dealing with the item which had been agreed among the Four was substantially that proposed by Mr. Martin. We had assumed, along with the United States and the United Kingdom, that the four Western powers would sponsor the resolution on disarmament, but Mr. Moch of France objected on the grounds that the Soviet Union, the fifth member of the Sub-Committee, should not be excluded. As there were difficulties about having the United States or the United Kingdom or France sole sponsor, Mr. Moch made the ingenious proposal that Canada should sponsor alone initially, and invite the other four members of the London Sub-Committee (United Kingdom, United States, France and USSR) to co-sponsor. The Western three would at once accept. As the resolution was largely procedural, it would be difficult for the USSR, on its present tack of sweet reasonableness, to refuse; and there would be no obvious "ganging up".

10. Within the limits of a general assessment of the Session, the story of the intricate negotiations between Mr. Martin on behalf of the Western sponsors and Mr. Vyshinsky cannot be told in detail. On several occasions, the talks nearly foundered, but thanks to persistence and a conciliatory spirit on both sides, Mr. Martin was able to achieve agreement on amendments which were acceptable to the Western Powers and permitted the USSR to co-sponsor the amended resolution. It was the first time since January, 1946, that East and West had agreed to co-sponsor a resolution. Ten days efforts had paid off.

11. It had been an interesting and in many ways valuable exercise for the Canadian Delegation. We were perhaps given more prominence in the press than was altogether warranted, for it had been a Western teamwork operation from beginning to end. On the other hand, Canadian Delegations at past Assemblies had too often been given far less recognition than was warranted because we have been content to exert what influence we could largely in private — as, for example, the untold story of Mr. Pearson's leading part in the Korean negotiations at the 1952 Assembly.

12. In the negotiations on disarmament, a good deal more than publicity was achieved at little risk. As M. Moch had realized, Mr. Vyshinsky was in a position in which he had to appear reasonable; he could not afford to be otherwise or it would undercut the favourable impression created by Soviet acceptance of the Anglo-French disarmament proposals as a basis of negotiations. Soviet counter-proposals already made it doubtful that the USSR had really given much away by accepting the Anglo-French paper "as a basis", and if they were shown to be reluctant to accept a non-controversial definition of the fundamental disarmament objectives and a reasonable procedure for resuming private negotiations, the sincerity of their new approach would have become highly questionable, even for European opinion. Any gain for Soviet propaganda by accepting the Western resolution was, in our opinion at least, more than paid for by the advantage to the West of pinning down the USSR

(a) to a timetable and procedure which would not conflict with French ratification, and

(b) to a definition of objectives in basically Western terms.

13. Moreover, in the course of debate on this item, the Soviet "concessions" were progressively cut down to size by diligent Western cross-examination of Mr. Vyshinsky's proposals.

14. On some important points — to do chiefly with phasing, the prohibition of atomic weapons and the reduction of arms and armed forces — there appeared to have been a real advance in the Soviet position. However, on the crux of the problem, control, there was little change in their basically unacceptable proposition that prohibition of atomic weapons must precede the effective institution of control in the sense of inspection, though there was a narrowing of the gap in the time table of prohibition and control.

15. It remains for the disarmament sub-committee to see whether, despite Western progress towards the controlled rearmament of Western Germany, some measure of agreement on a comprehensive disarmament system with effective safeguards and controls can yet be reached. When the Disarmament Sub-Committee had its first meeting on December 8, Mr. Sobolev, the Soviet Representative, sounded a discouraging note. He said that the decision of the Western Powers to permit the rearming of Western Germany was contrary to the spirit and intent of the disarmament resolution and would make a comprehensive system of disarmament difficult to obtain. When Mr. Sobolev was asked after the meeting if his statement meant that the Soviet Union would not be interested in taking part in disarmament talks if the decision to rearm Germany was ratified, he replied that his statement was not intended to have that implication but he did not elaborate.

Atoms for Peace

16. Disarmament and the next political item "Atoms for Peace" took up two-thirds of the First Committee's time. The "Atoms for Peace" item also culminated in a unanimous resolution although it was not co-sponsored by the Soviet Delegation. In some respects, however, the achievement of unanimity on this resolution was at least as important as the unanimity on the disarmament resolution. Both resolutions were, on a number of points, vague and evasive, dealing with procedure and broad objectives. But whereas few observers considered at the end of the session that a disarmament accord was within sight, there were good reasons for believing that, if the Western Powers wished to take the trouble, they might secure Soviet participation in an International Atomic Energy Agency under the United Nations.

17. The main outstanding problem which emerged from the debate was the question of the proposed agency's relationship to the Security Council. The Soviet Delegation maintained that some such relationship was essential in order to protect states from the risk of fissile material being diverted from peaceful to warlike purposes and in order to protect the minority group in the Agency from having its atomic policies wholly dictated by the majority.

18. Mr. Lodge resisted this argument, explaining that it was open to any state, in accordance with the Charter, to raise a matter affecting its security in the Security Council. What he wished to avoid was having the new Agency "bogged down in the veto". He did not, however, rule out some connection with the Security Council and in the end agreed to a modification in the wording of the Western resolution (which Canada joined in co-sponsoring) so as not to pre-judge this issue. As adopted, the resolution said simply that, once established, the Agency would negotiate an appropriate relationship with the United Nations. After some private negotiations between Mr. Lodge and Mr. Vyshinsky (who died a few days later), the sponsors omitted an explicit reference to their intention of establishing the relationship of the Agency to the United Nations on a basis similar to that of the Specialized Agencies. This concept of a Specialized Agency relationship, which had been initially suggested by the Canadian Delegation, was, however, the closest form of relationship the Western organizing powers (United States, United Kingdom, Canada, France, Belgium, Australia, South Africa, Portugal) were likely to accept.

19. Once the chief bone of contention between the United States and the USSR had been buried and unanimity on the resolution assured, the other delegations not directly involved showed the same tendency as in the disarmament debate to avoid putting forward amendments which might in any way upset the precarious apple-cart. On both the disarmament and atomic energy items India, Lebanon, Philippines and a number of other delegations would have pressed amendments or alternative resolutions but for the fact of Great Power unanimity. For fear of disturbing that rare achievement, India held back from pressing her intended claims to participate in both the disarmament and atomic energy private negotiations, although Mr. Krishna Menon made no secret of the fact that he had misgivings. Indeed, in the final stages of the atomic energy debate when the Peruvian Delegate was so rash as to say that since the Great Powers had agreed he thought the smaller ones should desist from efforts to improve matters, he was sharply taken to task by Mr. Krishna Menon who for the first time publicly expressed Indian apprehensions lest some day the United States and the USSR should agree and divide the world between them.

20. India and other countries were also critical of the Atomic Powers for their declared intention of negotiating a complete treaty setting up an Atomic Energy Agency before consulting more than perfunctorily with other countries and without convening a general conference of all prospective participants as had been done when other Specialized Agencies had been set up. To meet this criticism, it became necessary for the principal Western spokesmen to promise that before any treaty was ratified they would broaden the scope of consultations. This vague promise is taken to include India, Brazil, and other countries who would be in a position to make some contribution to an Atomic Energy Agency.

21. Aside from these rather marginal criticisms, the decision of President Eisenhower to report to the General Assembly on the progress of negotiations for the establishment of an Atomic Energy Agency, although the negotiations had hardly gone beyond consultations among a small group in Washington, was in the event vindicated by the enthusiasm and gratitude of the great majority of member states, all of whom were promised an opportunity to participate in the future work of the Agency. Indeed the problem became one of restraining the enthusiasm of those who fondly imagined that the era of atomic power was just around the corner. It was explained by Western spokesmen that the first requirement was for states to prepare themselves technically for economic power development which was still in the future, that the first function of the Agency would be to assist in technical training and research programmes. To this end, as a concrete indication that there was more to the Agency proposal than "training courses and isotopes" as Mr. Vyshinsky had caustically observed, the United States pledged to provide 220 lbs. and the United Kingdom 44 lbs. of fissile material for the future Agency. These offers undoubtedly made a great impression and contributed to the successful outcome of the debate.

22. Although the main interest of the debate naturally focused on the Atomic Energy Agency, unanimity for the secondary part of the resolution was also successfully negotiated, providing for the Secretary-General to convene next summer an International Scientific Conference. In organizing the Conference he will be assisted (and in fact guided) by an Advisory Committee composed of representatives of the USSR, United States, United Kingdom, Canada, France, India and Brazil. Here too the under-developed or non-atomic countries unsuccessfully sought additional representation on the Advisory Committee.

Korea

23. Although muted by the conciliatory mood created by the previous items, the spokesmen of the Soviet bloc in the Korean debate reiterated in routine fashion the old arguments of previous Assemblies and of the Geneva Conference. Genuinely free all-Korean elections could not take place, they said, in the presence of foreign occupation forces. They emphasized this point much more than the controversial character of United Nations supervision of the elections; for the formula presented in the report of the fifteen powers with troops in Korea was (thanks largely to persistent back-stage Canadian efforts) so flexible that it was difficult even for the Communists to take exception to it.

24. Apart from the Communists, there was general acceptance of the fact of stalemate in Korea and therefore of the probable futility of any future attempt in present circumstances to carry on negotiations from where the Geneva Conference left off. The attitude of the Indian Delegation in this regard was particularly helpful and it was unfortunate that the United States could not see its way clear to supporting an Indian resolution in substantially Western terms. In any event, however, the Western resolution was adopted with only four abstentions and the Soviet bloc alone in opposition.

American Airmen

25. Perhaps the best example of the way in which the close teamwork of the United States and United Kingdom worked at this Assembly was the inter-play between the two Delegations in private at the time of the debate towards the end of the session on the American fliers. The United Kingdom Delegation was so apprehensive when Mr. Lodge had first told Mr. Nutting of their intention of bringing this case before the United Nations and seeking at least condemnation of Communist China that Mr. Nutting had cabled home suggesting that Sir Winston Churchill intervene at once with the President. As it turned out this was not done because the United Kingdom Delegation was able to restrict the scope and moderate the language of the original United States resolution.

26. Looked at from the vantage point of New Delhi, the terms of the final resolution no doubt appear to be "singularly unhelpful" but in the atmosphere of New York and of the United States as a whole the resolution was about as moderate as could be expected. It could be argued that there would have been more chance of securing the release of the prisoners if no United Nations action had been taken and if the United States had followed the course taken by Canada in obtaining the release of Squadron Leader MacKenzie (i.e., negotiations in private). But once

President Eisenhower had publicly said that United Nations prestige was involved, some United Nations action became inevitable. Certainly the United States Delegation was determined, either with the support of the states with troops in Korea or without their support, to introduce a firm resolution at this Assembly.

27. Instead of a resolution being submitted in the Security Council condemning the Chinese Communist Government, a resolution was submitted in the Assembly condemning not the Government but the act of detaining the eleven United States airmen as a violation of the Armistice Agreement, while requesting the Secretary-General to mediate for the release of the airmen. Having secured the type of action acceptable to United States public opinion but least likely to lead to undesirable consequences in the event of a Communist rejection, the United Kingdom Delegation then spoke up vigorously in the Assembly in favour of the United States case.

Cyprus

28. The handling of the Cyprus item was another example of close United Kingdom-United States co-operation. Nutting's wholehearted support of the United States on the prisoners of war item was, no doubt, given with the hope of obtaining the wholehearted co-operation of the United States on the Cyprus item. This came about. The United States position on Cyprus was crucial and decisive. They were prepared to vote against any resolution on substance no matter how innocuous it might be but they were not prepared to canvass actively among Latin American or other Delegations in support of this position. The United States were, however, prepared not only to support a procedural resolution that the General Assembly should not further consider this item but were also prepared to canvass actively in support of it. The United Kingdom in order to attract the greatest United States support, persuaded the New Zealand Delegation to introduce a procedural resolution (that the General Assembly should not consider this question further) and to have it voted upon first.

29. In view of the fact that the Cyprus question had been inscribed by an Assembly vote of 30 to 19 with 11 abstentions, a very awkward vote on the apparently innocuous Greek resolution on the substance of the Cyprus question could not have been avoided without strong United States support among the Latin American Delegations in favour of the alternative procedural motion. So strong was the support for the postponement motion on Cyprus that had Mr. Kyrou, the Greek Delegate, not shrewdly decided to support it himself, (once the Latins had amended it by adding "for the time being"), he would have been left with only the Soviet bloc, Iceland, and a handful of Arabs and Latins supporting him. Indeed from the time he had heard incredulously of the United States decision to oppose rather than abstain on the Greek resolution, Mr. Kyrou had, with a good deal of dignity and moderation, reconciled himself to being a "good loser". (The mobs of angry students outside American Missions in Athens did not.)

New Guinea

30. The handling of the Indonesian item clearly points the contrast. Here the Netherlands delegation had been unable to secure the support of the United States which decided from the outset that it would abstain, in keeping with its traditional policy on colonial questions. The result was that, although in logic and in law the Netherlands had at least as good a case as had the United Kingdom for resisting Assembly pressure to negotiate, the Dutch had a much harder time of it in defending their point of view. Despite the strong and well reasoned opposition of the Netherlands and Australian Delegations, the First Committee adopted by more than a two-thirds majority a resolution expressing the hope that Indonesia and the Netherlands would pursue their endeavours to find a solution to the dispute and report on progress to the tenth session. This resolution was only defeated in plenary on the application of the two-thirds rule when Canada and five other countries changed their votes. The upshot was, therefore, that the Assembly adopted no resolution on this question. It is fully expected, however, that when the Indonesians return to the charge at the next session, the Netherlands will have to accept at least a reference to the International Court for an advisory opinion, as suggested at this session by the Canadian representative, on the questions of whether:

(a) the Netherlands retains sovereignty under the Round Table Agreements in the absence of a negotiated settlement, and

(b) the Netherlands has any continuing obligation to negotiate with Indonesia in view of the failure of the negotiations prior to the dissolution of the Netherlands-Indonesian Union.

Morocco and Tunisia

31. Taking their cue from the failure of the resolution on Indonesia and the success of the resolution on Cyprus, the Arabs progressively watered down their projected resolutions on Morocco and Tunisia until they merely postponed for the time being consideration of these questions. Here the decisive factor was not United States support for the status quo (as in the case of Cyprus), but the fact that the Mendes-France Government had adopted a much more conciliatory and liberal attitude towards North Africa, and Tunisia in particular. At the time of the Assembly's consideration of these questions, negotiations on Tunisia were actually proceeding in Paris between the Nationalists and the French Government, with comparable reforms and negotiations in prospect for Morocco, although the situation there was admittedly more difficult because of the position of the deposed Sultan. In view of the circumstances, the Arabs were not disposed to press for Assembly action at this session, pending the outcome of the negotiations on Tunisia and the evolution of French policy in regard to Morocco. Their limited objective, which they attained, was to keep the issue alive before the United Nations so that, if pending negotiations and reforms were not satisfactory, it could be raised again at future sessions of the Assembly.

32. In any event, the Arabs probably knew that in its present mood the Assembly would not have found a two-thirds majority in favour of doing anything more than this bare minimum. The French Delegation found itself in the unusual position of begging its friends to vote for both the resolution on Morocco and the resolution on Tunisia.

Colonialism and the United Nations

33. The same basic minimum was achieved by the Greek Delegation in the Cyprus debate. In this case, however, the Greeks were far less ready than the Arabs to acquiesce in a postponement resolution for, although they had succeeded in having the question of Cyprus recognized as one of "international concern", they had not secured the slightest encouragement for bilateral negotiations which they had sought to force upon the United Kingdom.

34. It may be said in passing that, although we are here discussing the Cyprus question with colonial questions since it was debated in the Assembly in that context, it cannot properly speaking be considered a colonial question since what is at issue is basically the transfer of sovereignty of a colonial territory from one member of the United Nations to another. There is, however, little question that given the right of self-determination — a right nowhere embodied in the Charter although there is a general reference to the principle — the Island of Cyprus would go to Greece. A similar argument can be made for not considering the question of West New Guinea as a colonial issue, but here the force of the argument is weakened by the fact that self-determination could have little meaning for the Papuan bushmen who, as the Foreign Minister of Indonesia said to the Australian Minister of External Affairs, "look a lot more like me than like you", although racially distinct from the Indonesian people.

35. It may be said, therefore, that the clearest colonial issues before the Political Committee at the present session were those of Tunisia and Morocco. Here the United Nations could legitimately take some share of the credit for creating during the past few years a sufficient body of public opinion, even in France, sympathetic to the aspirations of the North African Nationalists, to enable the Mendes-France Government, despite the colons lobby, to start on the path of negotiations and reforms which could scarcely have been contemplated by any French Government before the issue came to the United Nations. This may be an over-simplification, but in our opinion some credit should go to the United Nations for indirectly bringing a French Government to the point of tackling the problem by means of evolution and negotiation, rather than by purely repressive measures.

36. For its part, the Assembly responded to the new French policy towards Tunisia by expressing its confidence, in an almost unanimous resolution, that a satisfactory solution would be found.

Competence and Realism

37. The positions on these so-called colonial issues of a number of middle-of-the-road delegations, including the Canadian, show a significant shift during the present session. Although the South African, Australian, Belgian and French delegations continued to advance the classical arguments on competence based on the strict interpretation of Article 2(VII) (domestic jurisdiction), the United Kingdom delegation led the way, when opposing the inscription of the Cyprus issue, towards gaining increasing support for the "colonial position" on political and practical grounds rather than on grounds of competence. They found considerably more sympathy for arguments against adding additional items, the consideration of which could serve no useful purpose and which might lead to undesirable political and strategic consequences, than they did on the basis of legal arguments on competence. Australia also invoked the strategic argument in opposing action on New Guinea.

38. It was clear that a number of responsible delegations with liberal traditions with regard to the Assembly's competence to discuss almost every question were becoming concerned by the tendency to overload the Assembly's agenda with special grievances and use it as a sounding-board year after year for publicizing their points of view which could only come to fruition by bilateral negotiation outside the United Nations. Not only was this involving the Assembly in an increasingly long list of annually recurring items of doubtful international concern (of the type of "Indians in South Africa"), but there seemed to be a serious risk of the practice spreading and the Assembly becoming a "wailing-wall" for any country with an ethnic minority in some other country. From this point of view, Cyprus — the last remaining British-owned base in the Near East — might be but the first of a series of complaints seeking to detach bit by bit other strategic links in the chain of empire; and though even the best friends of the United Kingdom might feel critical of official public statements to the effect that the United Kingdom would "never" give Cyprus independence and would "never" talk to the Greeks about the future of the island, nevertheless there was a general reluctance to involve the United Nations on a course which could do little but exacerbate relations between friendly powers and drastically reduce the co-operation between the United Nations and some of its staunchest supporters.

39. For these reasons among others, the Canadian, Norwegian, Swedish and Danish delegations showed a stronger tendency than before to take sides on questions like Cyprus and New Guinea. For the first time in such a case, the Canadian Delegation opposed inscription of the Cyprus item. We also, in the end, gave outright support to the Netherlands and United Kingdom Delegations in the voting. The Scandinavian Delegations (with the exception of Iceland, which had its own axe to grind with the United Kingdom over fisheries) also came "off the fence" on these issues at this session and gave timely support to the United Kingdom in the Cyprus debate. Like the Canadian Delegation, the Scandinavians and others who shifted from a neutral position on these issues, did so on grounds of practicality and timeliness without in any way modifying their views on the question of competence.

The Work of Other Committees: the Ad Hoc

40. Most of the items assigned to the Ad Hoc Committee at this session had been discussed many times before and gave rise to very little in the way of new, original or creative ideas as to how solutions might be reached.

Chinese Nationalists Leave Burma

41. Substantial progress towards a satisfactory settlement was evident with respect to only one of the items, i.e., the Burmese complaint against Nationalist China. The Burmese, acknowledging a real improvement in the situation, again handled their case sensibly and moderately and, in fact, the harshest words uttered in the debate came from the Indian Representative. A resolution noting the progress made was adopted unanimously although the Chinese Delegation did not participate in the vote. This item and that on Palestine refugees were the only two of the eight items before the Ad Hoc Committee which did not produce either an East-West division or a division between the supporters and opponents of Article 2(VII).

South African Items

42. The atmosphere of the debate on treatment of Indians in South Africa was very much better than that of the later debate on race conflict. The resolution produced on the first of these items contained nothing condemnatory and placed full stress on direct negotiations as the only hopeful course. The South African Delegation showed its appreciation for this relative moderation by only abstaining on two parts of the resolution instead of following its usual policy of voting "no" on every part of every resolution relating to South Africa. The resolution on race conflict, on the other hand, was in much stronger language, and the debate, particularly the main Indian intervention by Mr. Trikumdas, was marked by a number of harshly worded accusations.

43. The Soviet bloc voted in favour of all parts of the resolutions adopted but played a brief and rather casual role in the debate. The 2(VII) group supported South Africa's arguments on domestic jurisdiction; the United States, Scandinavian and some Latin Delegations voted in favour of the innocuous expressions of decent sentiments and abstained on the more extreme parts of the resolutions, but took almost no part in debate; Canada continued nearer than the rest of the Old Commonwealth to the Indian position but expressed doubts on competence and utility.

Palestine Refugees

44. The debate on Palestine refugees consisted of a week or two of angry recriminations between the Arab States and Israel, and revealed no compromises on either side. The countries contributing to UNRWA managed to work in a few short statements to the effect that something had better be done fairly soon to get the refugees off relief because contributions would not be forthcoming forever. The Soviet bloc took no part at all in the debate on this item and abstained on the final resolution, along with Israel, Burma and Iraq. The Latin American and Afro-Asian delegations (other than Arabs) took almost no part in the debate at all, probably appreciating that the price of admission to this particular squabble was a contribution to UNRWA. The resolution was put up by France, Turkey, the United Kingdom and United States, all members of the Advisory Commission of UNRWA, and approves a relief and rehabilitation budget for the next fiscal year of UNRWA and extends the mandate of the Agency for five years. The fact that both Israel and Iraq abstained probably indicates that the sponsors did not go too far in acceding to the demands of either side.

New Members

45. On this subject, as on the three Soviet bloc items, the Committee divided primarily on East-West lines. All the familiar arguments and proposals with respect to new members were brought up again, but the permanent members of the Security Council, who, alone, can end this deadlock, showed no inclination to change their positions. The Soviet Union will refrain from vetoing Western candidates only as part of a package deal, and the other permanent members will not agree to any such approach. The main issue of new members was to some extent obscured in the debate by a side-show controversy between India and Australia over the admission of Laos and Cambodia. A number of Latin American countries again suggested solutions which ignore the veto right of permanent members of the Security Council, while India, Burma and the Scandinavian countries took a position, more or less shared by Canada, stressing the desirability of universality and not explicitly ruling out a package deal of some sort. Eventually, in a superficial show of unanimity, all outstanding applications were referred back without dissent for consideration by the Security Council. There was no serious consideration either of the Secretary-General's suggestion for breaking the log-jam by letting in a few quasi-neutrals or of a suggestion which the United States favoured (but did not mention in the debate) for some form of "non-member participation".

Soviet Bloc Items on War Propaganda, Aggression Against the People's Republic of China, and Freedom of Navigation in the China Seas

46. The first two of these items were clearly cold war propaganda productions and were treated as such throughout the debate. The Czech resolution on war propaganda was transformed into a United States resolution against the iron curtain and was passed by a large majority with only the 5 Soviet votes against and 10 abstentions (Afro-Asian countries and Yugoslavia). In a similar vote, the Soviet resolution on the item on United States aggression against China was rejected and was not replaced by any Western resolution.

47. The final Soviet item on freedom of navigation in the China Seas might have proved embarrassing, particularly to the United Kingdom, but also to all delegations interested both in freedom of navigation and in avoiding open disagreement with the United States. However, the Soviet bloc resolution and speeches were offensively anti-American, every act of the Chinese Nationalists being ascribed to the United States Government. This made it relatively easy for the United Kingdom, Scandinavian, Western European and Commonwealth countries, which would not have supported Nationalist China against well-founded charges, to line up with the United States in another straight East-West division. The final disposition of the item, a last-minute United States resolution referring records of the debate to the International Law Commission, was passed with only the 5 Soviet votes in opposition. By its own tactics the USSR had ensured the large majority which the United States can easily obtain when it is under direct Soviet attack.

48. There was certainly little general enthusiasm for the straight propaganda exchanges on these three items, and participation of countries other than the Soviet bloc on the one side and the United States and China on the other was rather perfunctory. The Canadian Delegation spoke in support of the United States on only one of the items, the charge of aggression, which was the most blatantly far-fetched of the three.

49. Of the eight items before the Ad Hoc Committee, only one, the admission of new members, seemed really to be of general interest to the whole Committee. On every other item, the countries or small groups of countries directly involved carried on a debate amongst themselves, while the great majority of Delegations watched from the sidelines and either took no part at all or made only short and routine statements of their points of view.

The Economic Committee and the Under-Developed Countries

50. In the Second (Economic) Committee, the United States Delegation found themselves in a peculiarly embarrassing position. For years Western spokesmen had made a great point of the constructive work of the United Nations Programme of Technical Assistance to which the USSR had never contributed "one red ruble". In the very year in which the Soviet Union had made its first contribution, however, Congress had seen fit to delete this portion of the United States foreign aid programme. Although the Administration hoped to remedy this misfortune in January, the United States at the present session was unable to pledge anything for the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance, although for the first time representatives of the Soviet bloc were joining in the general chorus of praise for the Expanded Programme and pledges of continuing or increased financial support.

International Finance Corporation

51. To meet this criticism, as well as for other reasons, the United States not only decided to play up its initiative in proposing the establishment of an International Atomic Energy Agency but announced on November 11, its decision to support the early establishment of an International Finance Corporation. This latter decision came as a surprise to practically all delegations but was almost universally welcomed as an important advance in international co-operation in the economic field, and as a significant concession to the "have nots" on the part of the United States, which pledged $35 million to the capitalization of the Corporation. The debate on the I.F.C. resolution, which requested the International Bank to draft statutes for the Corporation, was speedily completed in an atmosphere of cordiality and the resolution was adopted almost without opposition.

SUNFED

52. Aside from this advance in a related field, the underdeveloped countries made relatively little progress towards the achievement of their main objective — that of gaining the support of the industrialized countries for the early establishment of a Special United Nations Fund for Economic Development (SUNFED). As was the case at the previous session, the partisans of the Fund pressed hard not only to keep the idea of the Fund alive, but also to obtain the agreement of the industrialized countries to steps which would bring its establishment nearer. The United States and the United Kingdom, who would be the major contributors to the Fund if and when it is set up, were determined not to advance beyond the position they adopted last year, i.e., that the establishment of SUNFED should not be considered until sufficient progress has been made in internationally controlled world-wide disarmament. In view of the widely divergent points of view on this question, the SUNFED resolution, which was finally adopted after weeks of negotiation, represented an unsatisfactory compromise for both sides. In its most important operative clauses, it asked Mr. Raymond Scheyven, a former President of ECOSOC, to continue his consultations with governments about the Fund, and to prepare a new report giving "a full and precise picture of the form or forms" such a Fund might take. In accepting this provision, the industrialized countries made it clear that they did not interpret it as giving Mr. Scheyven a mandate to draw up draft statutes for the Fund.

53. SUNFED will undoubtedly be the most controversial economic issue at ECOSOC next spring and again in the Second Committee during the Tenth Session. We gathered from the United States Delegation that the Administration evidently regrets having gone as far as it did in supporting even the principle of the Fund. There appears to be a growing disposition in Washington to concentrate on bilateral aid programmes and to refuse to make any further concessions with regard to SUNFED or any other similar global plan.

54. The positive result of the debate on the International Finance Corporation appeared to have a mellowing effect on the Second Committee which dealt with all its remaining items in an atmosphere of cooperation and objectivity. The Soviet bloc, in line with the milder approach adopted by its representatives in all committees, directed its main criticism of Western economic policies to the debate on the report of the Economic and Social Council, in which they renewed with considerable effectiveness their demands for an easing or removal of the restrictions on trade with Communist countries. About the only note of real political discord was injected during the debate on UNKRA when the representatives of the USSR, Poland, and Czechoslovakia charged that programmes of economic assistance sponsored by UNKRA, and bilaterally by the United States, had failed completely, while, on the other hand, the assistance given by the Soviet group to North Korea had been of great benefit to its people.

Human Rights and Wrongs

55. The Third (Social) Committee was successful this year in taking some practical decisions. The most significant of these were:

- (a) to authorize the United Nations High Commissioner for refugees to undertake a $12 million five-year programme in consultation with the Advisory Committee;
- (b) to establish a Universal Children's Day;
- (c) to authorize the Secretary-General to render to member states services outside the scope of technical assistance programmes with a view to promoting freedom of information; and
- (d) to set up a United Nations Narcotics Laboratory in Geneva.

Except in the case of the High Commissioner's programme, which was opposed by the Soviet bloc, these decisions did not prove controversial.

56. However, the Committee made little, if any, progress on any of the items on its agenda which had a political content. The draft International Covenants on Human Rights, which at last came before the Assembly, were the subject of a procedural decision. The first reading of the Covenants took the form of a general debate; no decision, even of a provisional nature, was taken on the contents of any of the Articles. In line with the suggestion of the Commission on Human Rights, the Committee decided that special priority should be given at the next session of the Assembly to the second reading of the Covenants. Although no tangible results ensued from the general debate on the Covenants, which occupied some twenty meetings, this discussion had a sobering effect on the self-appointed champions of human rights in the Third Committee by underlining the fundamental differences still separating different groups of states in spite of the painstaking efforts of the Human Rights Commission to produce drafts which would provide a common denominator. From the Canadian point of view, this discussion gave federal states the opportunity of emphasizing once again in unmistakable terms the impossibility of their signing the Covenants unless there is a suitable federal clause in place of what has been referred to as "the anti-federal clause" proposed by the Commission at the instigation of the Soviet Union. Although no satisfactory federal state clause was proposed, one worthy of the name would probably have secured a majority, if not a two-thirds.

57. Except for Mrs. Lord's short statement at the beginning of the debate, the United States Delegation remained aloof from the discussion and abstained on all but one of the fifteen votes taken on the Human Rights resolution. This attitude was no doubt dictated by the decision of the Administration, reiterated in Mrs. Lord's speech, not to sign the draft Covenants. In view of the great importance which a very large number of states obviously attach to this question, not to mention the emotional attitude of many of them in this matter, this decision of the United States, if it is maintained, may in the end do them more harm than good in the world at large. But Congress is another matter.

Forced Labour

58. The West had the advantage over the Soviet bloc in the main "cold war" item on the Third Committee's agenda, Forced Labour, on which ECOSOC's condemnation was endorsed. It gave rise, however, to a depressing propaganda exercise reminiscent of the Stalin era. The United States this year was silent on conditions in the Soviet Union and instead gave detailed data on Communist China and Albania. In reply, the Soviet delegate used fairly strong language vis-à-vis the United States and accused the United Kingdom delegate of having joined in this exercise as a result of United States pressure. From the restraint exercised by Commonwealth and other Western European countries in this matter, it was apparent that these countries will be glad to see the subject returned to ECOSOC and ILO.

Assembly vs. ECOSOC

59. The Western European and Commonwealth countries found themselves isolated when the Afghanistan delegation submitted a resolution which was tantamount to a vote of censure of ECOSOC for its failure to transmit to the Assembly two resolutions of the Commission on Human Rights on the question of self-determination.

60. The Arabs, Asians and Latin Americans also succeeded in having the Assembly revise a decision of ECOSOC to leave aside for the time being the perennial question of an International Convention on Freedom of Information. Here again the Assembly specifically requested ECOSOC to make recommendations for consideration at the eleventh session. During many discussions of the Committee, a number of Asian and Arab countries implied that they regarded ECOSOC as the "instrument of the imperialist powers" (which clearly have less trouble controlling ECOSOC than they do . . . the Assembly). The Third Committee's reaction was a sign of dangers to come if Western control of ECOSOC is abused.

61. The Session furnished further evidence that the West is almost constantly on the defensive in the Third Committee. The long experience of some of the leading Moslem delegations who have sat in the Committee for almost a decade, facilitates their task. Western weakness became particularly apparent during the Ninth Session in procedural discussions, and the Czechoslovakian chairman did not make life easier for Western delegates.

Trusteeship and Colonialism: Stretching the Charter

62. Once again the non-administering members of the United Nations in the Fourth Committee (led this year by the Delegations of Yugoslavia, Lebanon and Venezuela) have pushed ahead in their efforts to extend the supervisory role of the General Assembly over the Trusteeship Council and the administering members, and to equate the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter with those of Chapter XII and XIII setting up the Trusteeship Council. In this, of course, they are deliberately following the aim which they have set themselves, of "wiping colonialism from the face of the earth".

63. While the United Nations interest in promoting the well-being of the inhabitants of dependent territories and their development towards self-government or independence is fully recognized, the Charter clearly sets forth the rights and responsibilities of the administering authorities. These rights and responsibilities cannot be changed except by amending the Charter. This point was stressed on several occasions by the delegations of Australia, Belgium, France and the United Kingdom. These delegations pointed out that there was a bland assumption on the part of the non-administering powers that the General Assembly was entitled to alter or amend Charter obligations by simply adopting resolutions. This danger of "back door" Charter amendments influenced the vote of the Canadian Delegation and to a lesser extent that of the Scandinavian countries on at least half of the fourteen resolutions which were tabled in Committee during the Ninth Session.

64. Another persistent characteristic of the Fourth Committee debates inherited from previous sessions was the tendency of the anti-colonial group to develop fixations which tie their minds to particular solutions, closing them to all other possibilities. Thus, the anti-colonial group insisted upon unification as the only solution for the problem of Togoland and Trusteeship as the only possible future for South West Africa.

65. This year the Indian Delegation proved to be a striking exception to this general rule. Perhaps more because of a change of representatives than of basic policy, India voted in favour of asking the International Court for an advisory opinion as to the legality of the procedures proposed for the Assembly's consideration of petitions and reports on South West Africa. Again on the case of Togoland, India actually sponsored the United Kingdom proposal that after the Gold Coast attains its independence, and the United Kingdom would no longer be administering British Togoland as a Trust Territory, that the views of the inhabitants as to their future status should be ascertained. Since the majority view is likely to oppose unification of the Togolands, this was a radical approach for a leading "anti-colonial" power to take. India's decision to act in this manner sprang from a promise given by the Prime Minister of the Gold Coast to Mr. Nehru earlier this year to champion the cause of independence of British Togoland united with the Gold Coast.

66. The inhabitants of Trust Territories have not been long in realizing the meaning of the resolutions adopted year after year by the General Assembly, curtailing the powers and responsibilities of the administering authorities. Except in matters affecting their every day life, they have come to consider the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly, rather than the Trusteeship Council or its Standing Committee on Petitions, as the proper venue for their petitions relating to the future political status of their territory. No less than 17 petitioners, most of them from the Trust Territory of Togoland, appeared to plead their special causes before the Fourth Committee at this session.

Administrative and Financial Matters: The Per Capita Principle

67. For Canada, the issue of greatest direct interest in the Fifth Committee was the Report of the Committee on Contributions which proposed, on a new interpretation of the per capita ceiling principle, an increase from 3.3% to 3.63% in Canada's assessment for the United Nations Budget, and also called in question the principle itself. As the per capita ceiling is Canada's unique protection against an inequitable assessment, it was necessary to put up a vigorous fight against the Contributions Committee's recommendations. At the price of accepting the slightly higher assessment, the delegation succeeded in getting the per capita principle reaffirmed and interpreted so as to freeze our contribution against further increases until we reach per capita parity with the United States, or until new members are admitted, or the economic capacity of present members improves. The Contributions Committee's interpretation of the per capita principle was demonstrably incorrect and its questioning of the principle unwarranted, but most of the underdeveloped countries, and even some of our Commonwealth and European friends, were initially unsympathetic to the Canadian position. The final result was therefore a considerable victory.

Tribunal Awards

68. Toward the end of the session, the question of the awards of compensation made by the Administrative Tribunal troubled the Fifth Committee again, though much less acutely than at the Eighth Session. In view of the clear opinion of the International Court of Justice, there was no longer any doubt that the Assembly must pay the disputed awards, but the United States was determined that there should be safeguards against excessive or unwarranted awards in the future. It proposed a number of amendments to the statute of the Administrative Tribunal, the most important of which would establish a Board of Judicial Review. The Canadian delegation was not at all happy about many features of the United States proposals and we could see that there would be very strong opposition to them in the Fifth Committee. We recognized, however, that this was a very important issue for the United States and we did not wish to see a headlong collision between them and other Western delegations. After discussion with the United States Delegation, therefore, Canada took the initiative in the Fifth Committee in proposing that the Assembly should decide in principle to establish a procedure for judicial review of the Administrative Tribunal's decisions but postpone consideration of the details. This solution was eventually accepted, but not without much resistance from the Western European countries, India, Egypt, Brazil and others. In acceding to the wishes of the majority, the United States had to make major concessions and deserves credit for doing so.

Secretariat Re-organization

69. Although the Secretary-General's Budget for next year, already reduced through staff cuts and other means, by approximately $1 million from the present Budget, was given a relatively easy passage (the 1955 net Budget figure being fixed at approximately $39,500,000), the Secretary-General ran into trouble over his plans for the re-organization of the top structure of the Secretariat and the allowances, particularly the representation allowances, which he proposed to give to his top men. It may be that Mr. Hammarskjöld's honeymoon with the Assembly last year led him to over-estimate the freedom of action he had been granted. The Fifth Committee demonstrated at the present session that it was still master of the purse, and the Secretary-General had unwillingly to accept a considerably modified system of allowances for the upper ranks of the Secretariat.

Legal Problems

70. Once again the work of the Sixth Committee underlined the unreadiness of member states to seek the early codification and application of international law to current international problems. As in previous years, general agreement was secured only on procedural dispositions of the various questions coming before the lawyers and postponement was the order of the day.

Continental Shelf and Fisheries

71. Important areas of substance were, however, discussed. It would be well to take warning for the future that serious trouble is brewing over the Continental Shelf, High Seas Fisheries and the Regime of the High Seas generally. The International Law Commission is to make recommendations on these questions to the 1956 Assembly — in the case of Fisheries, the International Law Commission will be assisted by a report from a Scientific and Technical Conference which is to be convened in the meantime. The basic conflict of interest which is reflected in the legal positions adopted on these questions stems from the fact that some countries wish to fish in other people's waters, some have fishing grounds in their own waters and want to protect them, and others, having few fish in their waters, nevertheless have valuable natural resources in the continental shelf below. Relations between the United Kingdom and Iceland are already seriously strained by Iceland's protectionism. Other disputes in this field have set some of the Latin American countries (particularly Peru, Ecuador and Chile) against the United States. As the development of fisheries and the exploitation of resources in the continental shelf become increasingly important, widely divergent legal theories will be developed to justify national economic interests, and the sooner a comprehensive re-thinking and re-negotiation of basic concepts and present law is undertaken by all concerned, the better chance there will be of avoiding serious international disputes on these questions in the future.

72. The other issues postponed by the Sixth Committee are less likely to cause difficulty in the future. The majority of the Latin American and Arab delegations, supported by the Soviet bloc, are however likely to resist indefinite postponement of these issues and we may therefore expect repetitious debates at future sessions on such subjects as a draft Code of Offences, the Definition of Aggression, and the establishment of an International Criminal Court. Only the United States is opposed to all three schemes, though most Western countries (except France and the majority of the Latin Americans) are skeptical of the possibility of defining aggression in a satisfactorily comprehensive manner. The United States and the Soviet bloc are the delegations chiefly opposed to the International Criminal Court and most members seem anxious that a Code of Offences should not go beyond the Nuremburg principles already affirmed unanimously by the General Assembly. It does not seem likely that the Assembly will be called upon to adopt any of these projects in the near future.

Groups and Personalities

73. Few delegates enhanced their reputation at this Assembly and some definitely suffered a loss of prestige. Mr. Krishna Menon, for example, although helpful and constructive in his handling of the Korean item, was too obviously piqued by finding himself unable to hold the centre of the stage as the great mediator when East and West agreed, without his assistance, on the disarmament and atomic energy items. Mr. Menon nevertheless spoke indefatigably on almost every subject, even where his ability to contribute was clearly limited by the circumstances of East-West agreement or, on colonial questions, by unusual willingness of the Latin-American Delegations to postpone colonial questions rather than urge negotiations as they have in the past.

74. Sir Percy Spender also achieved little in return for his active efforts on disarmament and on new members. He did, however, handle the Australian case on West New Guinea vigorously and successfully. By and large, Sir Percy was too obviously in the U.S. orbit to exercise much influence at this Assembly. His colleague from "down under", Mr. Munro of New Zealand, maintained a better balance and was one of the few who did enhance their reputations.

75. Among the Arabs, both Dr. Jamali and Dr. Azmi of Egypt (who died at a Security Council meeting during the Assembly) reflected the marked improvement in the relations between the Arabs and the Western Powers in recent months. Although both remained solid supporters of special Arab causes, they and most of their colleagues were more outright in their support of Western positions on East-West issues. In fact, only Mr. Shukaity of Syria maintained the fiction of "the Western menace" to the Arab world through the building up of Israel.

76. In their more pliant mood, the Latin American Delegations did not produce any outstanding spokesmen at this session. The Chairman of the caucus, Mr. Trujillo of Ecuador was sensible and usually helpful but leadership in the group more often came from the Brazilian and Colombian Delegations who maintained the closest relations with the United States and United Kingdom Delegations. Their most influential figure was the Columbian delegate, Mr. Urrutia, who presided over the First Committee with rare skill and judgment. Though the Latins were prepared at this session to accept the leadership of the main Western Delegations on most colonial and economic questions, it should not be assumed that they have abandoned their objectives or their principles and will necessarily be prepared to repeat their votes in favour of postponement of such issues at future sessions.

Leadership

77. Although the President of the Assembly, Mr. van Kleffens of the Netherlands, made an impeccable presiding officer, correct and impartial, he showed a lack of warmth and imagination in his public relations and seldom if ever gave a private lead, as have some of his predecessors.

78. Led by the late Mr. Vyshinsky, who showed the Assembly his most urbane face before his sudden death, the USSR once again sent half a dozen of their top diplomats to the Assembly — probably a higher concentration of national talent than any other delegation. Although their tactics were much more flexible and intelligent than in the past, their attempts to open up divisions in Western ranks, whether over disarmament or on Asian matters, were unsuccessful. On disarmament, they tried to do so by sweet reasonableness but were met in kind, while in Asian matters, where they might have done better, they reverted to cold-war propaganda. One of our unexpected conclusions from the disarmament and atomic energy negotiations was that Mr. Vyshinsky was apparently given more latitude to decide tactical questions on the spot than we had supposed.

79. The well-concerted United States-United Kingdom leadership, was undoubtedly strengthened by the authority of President Eisenhower's cautious approach to troublesome international questions. At the Assembly itself, the United States gained rather than lost by the substitution of Mr. Wadsworth for Mr. Cabot Lodge on most political questions. Mr. Lodge handled only the items dealing with the atomic energy agency and with the United States airmen in China. In other respects, he gave the impression of a man who did not expect to stay long in his present position. Coming into his own for the first time, Mr. Wadsworth proved an able and agreeable spokesman and exerted (at times unsuccessfully) a constructive and moderate influence on the State Department. Indeed, but for his private interventions, the United States position on disarmament and on Korea might have been difficult for its allies to support whole-heartedly.

80. The chief architects of Anglo-American co-operation at this session were the leaders of the United Kingdom Delegation, Mr. Selwyn Lloyd and later, Mr. Anthony Nutting. Both set out deliberately to achieve U.S. support for U.K. objectives. Mr. Lloyd distinguished himself once again by his capacity to simplify and clarify the essential features of the technical disarmament debate, while Mr. Nutting endeared himself to a wide television audience in the United States by his strong support for the American airmen, though his comments (outside the Assembly) on the defence of Formosa landed him in hot water at home.

81. Once again, the French Delegation played a relatively passive role, while the influence of the fifth permanent member of the Security Council, Nationalist China, had become almost non-existent. It is an interesting commentary on the present role of Nationalist China in the United Nations that during the entire debate on the atomic energy agency, we learned from their delegation that they had sent no cables home. Yet they continue to sit on all United Nations bodies as a permanent members.

Chinese Representation

82. This raises a question which, thanks again to Anglo-American cooperation, proved much less troublesome at this session than had been feared. Without difficulty, it was decided at the beginning of the session not to consider the issue for the remainder of the year. As a result, the Soviet delegation did not even raise the question of Chinese Communist participation in the debate on the American airmen in China in which the Chinese were condemned in absentia.

83. It is, however, an open secret that at the next session the United Kingdom Government reserve the right to raise the question. How they will do so has not been decided, but the possibility of giving Formosa membership at the same time as admitting the Communist Chinese has been considered, dependent upon the good behaviour of the latter in the meantime. When it comes to the point, however, the United Kingdom, faced with a renewal of the Cyprus debate, will be very strongly tempted to dodge the Chinese representation question once again, if opinion in the United States remains as strongly opposed to the admission of the Communists as it is now. Without United Kingdom support, Communist China could not conceivably gain the Chinese seat, as it is doubtful whether the United Kingdom's contention that the issue of representation (as distinct from membership) can be decided by majority vote would be supported by the Assembly. Potentially, however, this is the biggest question for the next session of the Assembly.

ASSISTANCE TO PALESTINE REFUGEES

Mr. Chaput has asked for the views of the European Division on the policy which Canada should adopt on the question of assistance to Palestine Arab refugees, which is to come up for consideration during the ninth session of the UN General Assembly.

2. Last March, when Canada's contribution to UNRWA was announced, the Canadian Permanent Representative was instructed to tell the Chairman of the Negotiating Committee that future contributions from the Canadian Government would be dependent upon the progress made toward a final solution of the Palestine refugee problem.⁴⁷

3. In Jordan, where the main body of refugees is congregated, a certain number have been absorbed during the past year in agriculture and in business enterprises. Some of these had obtained loans from the Jordanian Government under an aid programme suggested by British officials. Others were able to get off to a fresh start because they had just recovered savings frozen for the past five years in Israeli banks. Still others have managed to find work in oilfields of neighbouring countries. Every such instance of self-help has been welcomed as a sign that six years of abnormal living conditions have not entirely destroyed the self-respect of refugees. These individual cases of rehabilitation, however, have not appreciably affected the main refugee problem, encouraging though they may be in themselves.

4. After allowing UNRWA to operate for over a year without a Director, the Secretary-General of the United Nations finally found in Mr. Henry Labouisse a man whom he considered capable of taking charge of the Agency effectively. In the period since March 1, 1953, when Mr. Blandford left, the administration has been carried on on a provisional basis. Various administrative experiments have been introduced, and some of them discarded. It would have been surprising if some ground had not been lost, since in a situation where so many conflicts of interest are involved, continuous and effective United Nations leadership is an essential. Now that a Director has been appointed, the United Nations component in the joint enterprise should be ready once more to play the part allotted to it in the fields of planning, diplomacy and administration.

5. Of two main projects for large-scale refugee resettlement (in the Sinai Peninsula and on lands in Syria and Jordan to be supplied with water and power from the Yarmuk-Jordan Basin) we understand that the former has continued according to plan. There seems to have been no interruption of the preparatory work required for the resettlement of 50,000 refugee families in the Sinai Peninsula on lands to be irrigated by water drawn from the Nile Valley. The very much larger Yarmuk development scheme, to which both Syria and Jordan agreed some time ago, has been held up this year, however, as a result of a train of events set off last September when Israel began canal-digging operations to divert the water of the Jordan River without the agreement of its neighbours. The Security Council dealt with aspects of Israel's action which related to non-observance of the armistice agreement. Meanwhile the United States Government decided the time had come to try to secure a rational plan for the exploitation of all the meagre water resources of the area in the interests of the four countries concerned — namely, Jordan, Israel, Syria and Lebanon. It sent Mr. Eric Johnston to sound out the various governments on the possibility of an agreed programme of development of the Yarmuk-Jordan Basin. Although Mr. Johnston arrived when feelings were highly inflamed over the

On March 4, 1954, Cabinet authorized a contribution of $500,000 to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine refugees for the 1953-54 financial year.

Qibiya affair, and although neither Israel nor the Arab states would at first accept the principles he suggested, he persuaded them not to reject his proposals without further thought. He pursued the subject with them later and was able in June of the present year to report that all four governments had agreed to the principle of unified development of the Jordan-Yarmuk Basin and an equitable and mutually acceptable division of its waters, to be controlled by an impartial international authority. This agreement in principle represents the first break in the mutually uncompromising attitudes of Israel and its neighbours. Although it has meant that work on the Yarmuk development scheme sponsored by UNRWA has had to be held up pending the outcome of negotiations between Mr. Johnston and the four governments, the fact that an agreement in principle has been reached for the first time on a substantial issue dividing Israel from its neighbours is considered to be of greater importance in the long run, and represents greater progress toward a final settlement of issues outstanding between the parties to the Palestine conflict than was considered possible last autumn.

6. For UNRWA the agreement on certain principles obtained by Mr. Johnston seems to mean three things:

(a) There will be an additional delay before the refugees can be settled, since the Yarmuk plan cannot be put into effect until details of the unified development plan have been worked out.

(b) The unified development plan may be financed by bank loans and private investment rather than by international contributions through the United Nations, although this is not yet certain.

(c) In the meantime the refugees will continue to need relief on a scale which the Arab states will not be able to meet, although they may be expected to continue to provide aid on the present scale.

7. In considering whether Canada should or should not contribute this year to the relief, as distinguished from the rehabilitation, of Palestine refugees, the following points should perhaps be kept in mind.

8. There is an alternative to relief which UNRWA has never suggested because it would be beyond its competence to do so. This would be more just, perhaps, than the existing arrangement and therefore preferable to the operation in which we are at present engaged. The alternative would be to cut off all international relief for Arab refugees after providing Israel with a long-term loan with which to pay them the compensation which is their due. The two chief obstacles to suggesting this course of action at the ninth session of the General Assembly, however, are that there is no agreement yet on the amount of compensation owed by Israel, although Israel has repeatedly said that it will meet its obligations in this respect, and the total is likely to be very much greater than anything the United Nations would be called on to contribute in the way of relief over a considerable number of years. The initiative in suggesting a proper scale of compensation for Arab refugees lies with the Palestine Conciliation Commission, and Israel has shown a marked disinclination to have that body take up the matter actively. In the circumstances this proposal is not likely to be made at the ninth session of the Assembly, although if the way were properly prepared for it we do not see why it should not be suggested at the tenth session.

9. For the following reasons we would recommend that Canadian contributions to the relief programme should continue:

(a) Relief, even on the very limited scale of 3¢ a day, has hitherto prevented the refugees from getting out of hand. This is not a large price to pay for absence of general conflict.

(b) There is no reason to suppose that the refugees will be tempted to make serious trouble in the future if the present scale of relief continues.

Should they feel themselves abandoned, however, by governments which took an active interest in the partition of Palestine and have been trying since 1948 to maintain a just balance between the parties to the Palestine conflict, the revulsion of feeling might be expected to assume grave proportions.

(c) Canada has given renewed proof of its desire to help ease the tensions in the area by making available the services of General Burns as Chief of Staff of the UN Truce Supervision Organization and sending four officers to serve as military observers. It is also preparing to open diplomatic missions in Tel Aviv, Cairo and Beirut with a view to establishing closer bonds of friendship with the peoples of that area. It would be inconsistent with this policy to leave the entire burden of refugee relief to others, particularly since withdrawal from the operation would be likely to place fresh obstacles in the way of General Burns' success at a time when he is already burdened with serious difficulties. It would also get Canada's three new diplomatic missions in the area off to an unfortunate start. (It must be remembered that international relief for Palestine Arab refugees is beneficial to Israel as well as to the refugees themselves since it relieves Israel of pressure to pay refugees the compensation which is due them and prevents infiltration of Arab refugees into Israel on a very much greater scale than already exists.)

10. It seems to the European Division that we should be in a position to maintain that there is good reason for Canada to continue to participate in the UN programme for relief of Palestine Arab refugees in view of:

(a) the progress made during recent months toward securing Arab-Israel cooperation in the development of water resources of the area which should reduce existing tensions and provide a more secure basis for resettlement of displaced persons;

(b) the recent appointment of Mr. Labouisse as Director of UNRWA;

(c) the uninterrupted work on the Sinai project.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO VARIOUS UNITED NATIONS PROGRAMMES

A number of interested officials have become increasingly aware of the advantages that would result from considering simultaneously and as one subject the contributions to a number of United Nations programmes that are to be recommended for Cabinet approval. Officials of this Department and of the Department of Finance met together on September 10 to discuss in this way what might be appropriate contributions to UNICEF, UNKRA,⁴⁸ UNRWA and the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance (ETAP). Mention was also made of the possibility of a contribution to the fund which the High Commissioner for Refugees is attempting to have established; this programme was thought, however, to merit a separate decision when further information about its full implication has been received.

2. Those in attendance were:

Mr. Rae (Chairman), United Nations Division
Mr. Chaput, United Nations Division
Mr. McGill, United Nations Division
Mr. Jay, United Nations Division
Mr. Ritchie, Economic Division
Mr. Hadwen, Economic Division
Mr. Hemsley, Finance Division
Miss MacCallum, European Division
Mr. Plumptre, Finance Department
Mr. Clarke, Finance Department

3. The meeting recognized the desirability of bearing in mind the possible size of the next contribution to the Colombo Plan in dealing with the question of contributions to the above programmes.⁴⁹ Nevertheless, it was thought that the two matters were essentially separate.

4. Mr. Plumptre said that he was particularly pleased to participate in discussions aimed at bringing into one focus the several contributions to the programmes in question, since he was anxious to approach Mr. Harris with a comprehensive picture of all contributions to the United Nations. He felt that this procedure might offer a better chance of securing his Minister's favourable consideration of the contributions than would a procedure entailing piecemeal consideration.

5. Mr. Plumptre informed the meeting that his own thinking started with the knowledge that a Treasury Board directive would soon be issued to all Departments urging the maintenance of estimates at not more than last year's overall level. Accordingly he felt that the total to be contributed to the four programmes (UNICEF, UNKRA, UNRWA and ETAP) should not be substantially different from last year. He agreed with the view of the External officials that there seemed to be special justification in carrying over into the civil field the large measure of support hitherto given in the military field in Korea. For that reason he intimated that he would be disposed to favour an increase in the Canadian contribution to UNKRA as the External officials had proposed. The increase in mind would be based on the present relationship among the contributions of Canada, the United Kingdom and Australia, would be conditional upon increases in the pledges of the other two countries, and would be designed with their increases to fill a $3 million gap that would otherwise remain in what appears to be the most acceptable plan for a reduced total programme in 1954-55 of $44.9 million which the United States has formulated.

6. Mr. Plumptre also felt that there might be some justification for an increase in the contribution to UNICEF, since that programme seemed to have a particularly wide appeal in Canada and had the reputation of being efficiently administered. The meeting agreed that, contrary to the suggestion made by officials last year, there is much to be said for making an un-tied contribution to a programme like UNICEF to which there is every prospect that Canada will continue to contribute over a number of years. Accordingly it was decided to consult further with Mrs. Adelaide Sinclair from the Department of National Health and Welfare with a view to arriving at what might be an appropriate total for an increased contribution that could be recommended to Ministers. (See Annex re 1954 recommendation.)†

7. Mr. Plumptre went on to say that in view of the increases contemplated for UNKRA and UNICEF, he felt that the contributions to ETAP and UNRWA required most careful thought. With respect to the latter he pointed out that in its earlier decision, Cabinet had stipulated that continued participation in UNRWA would be contingent upon the progress made towards the final solution of the Palestine refugee problem. Since he was unaware of any significant measure of success achieved in this regard, he assumed that it might not be inappropriate to consider a reduction, if not a discontinuance, of the Canadian contribution.⁵⁰

8. In respect of the contribution to ETAP, Mr. Plumptre noted that Canada is already out in front in the sense that hers is the third largest contribution, was increased by almost 90 per cent last year and represents a greater percentage of the U.S.A. contribution than is usually the case. In addition he expressed the views that ETAP was not as popular in Canada as for example UNICEF and that there is reason to believe that the programme is badly administered.⁵¹

9. As against Mr. Plumptre's views with respect to UNRWA and ETAP, the officials concerned in this Department have had in mind a contribution to UNRWA of the same magnitude as last year and an increased contribution to ETAP. A number of pertinent arguments in support of an increase in the technical assistance contribution were adduced by the External officials. (e.g. the increasing needs of the programme as it progresses, the increasingly important role which it is playing in reinforcing our Colombo Plan operations, the indications that several countries might be prepared to increase their contributions particularly if encouraged by our example.) It was noted that if we made available only the same amount as last year, our effective contribution to technical assistance activities would actually be reduced this year since some ten per cent of any new contribution will be absorbed in the Working Capital Fund and will not be available for financing current operations. So far as UNRWA was concerned, the difficulty of assessing progress in a matter of this kind was noted and special emphasis was of course laid on the facts that we are opening new missions in the Middle East and that a Canadian, General Burns, has recently been appointed Chief of Staff of the United Nations Truce Supervisory Organization. It is generally thought within this Department that, in the light of all political, administrative and financial circumstances the proposed increase in our contribution to ETAP and the maintenance of our UNRWA contribution are justifiable.

10. The officials of the Department of Finance however seemed not to be entirely persuaded to the External view on the appropriate size of the contributions to UNRWA and ETAP. In any event, it seemed clear that if they were to come more to the External position they would be less inclined to favour an increase in the contribution to UNICEF.

11. It was agreed that there would be merit in preparing for your signature a comprehensive submission to Cabinet covering the contributions to the four programmes and that, although the Finance officials might feel compelled to make their own possibly conflicting recommendation to Mr. Harris, it would be useful if substantial accord on the factual presentation on each contribution could be reached.

12. Under the circumstances it would be helpful to know

(a) whether you would favour a comprehensive submission to Cabinet dealing with all of the contributions in question as one problem, but covering separate annexes detailing the argumentation appropriate to each of the programmes individually;

(b) and whether, in spite of the likelihood that Finance officials will probably recommend appreciable lower amounts for UNRWA and ETAP, you would wish such a submission to seek authority for the following contributions which your officials feel would be appropriate and justifiable:⁵²

- (1) UNKRA: $750,000, which is the balance remaining out of the total contribution of $8 million already approved by Cabinet and would provide for a proportionate Canadian share of the gap of $3 million in the United States plan, subject to proportionate increases in the pledges of the United Kingdom and Australia.
- (2) UNICEF: $600,000 (subject to further consultation with Mrs. Sinclair), which would provide for an increase of about $100,000 over last year's contribution.
- (3) UNRWA: $500,000, which is equal to last year's contribution.

⁵² Note marginale :/Marginal note:
yes [L.B. Pearson]

- (4) ETAP: $2 million or $2.5 million (i.e. an increase of $500,000 or $1 million); alternatively a figure of $1,650,000 might be suggested if we would be content to have our effective contribution (after allowing for the $150,000 required for the Working Capital Fund) kept at last year's level.⁵³

Dear Mr. Pearson:

CONTRIBUTIONS TO VARIOUS UNITED NATIONS PROGRAMMES⁵⁴

Attached are two copies of the comprehensive draft submission to Cabinet† recommending the following contributions to four programmes, provision for which is not included in the regular budget of the United Nations:

1. UNKRA—$750,000, subject to proportionate increases in the contributions of the Governments of the United Kingdom and Australia.
2. UNICEF—$600,000.
3. UNRWA—$500,000.
4. Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance—$2.5 million.

This draft has been prepared in accordance with your wishes as marginally noted on the memorandum on this subject prepared for you on September 14. You will recall that the memorandum explained that officials in the Department of Finance would probably recommend that the contributions to UNRWA and ETAP be appreciably lower than those recommended in this draft submission. We have since learned informally from the Department of Finance that the proposed contributions to these two programmes, particularly the contribution of $2.5 million suggested for ETAP, will undoubtedly meet with firm opposition from the Minister of Finance when the subject is discussed in Cabinet. In view of the possibility that the full request for the ETAP programme might not receive Cabinet approval, you might wish to consider whether it would be desirable for you to be prepared to agree to a compromise figure providing for maintenance of the contribution at last year's level — namely $1.5 million — plus an additional 10% to help meet the effect of withholding from current operations a sum of $3 million for the Working Capital Fund. This would constitute a total contribution of $1,650,000.

It had been our intention to have this item included on the agenda of the Cabinet meeting on Wednesday, September 22, in order to obtain an early indication of the size of the Canadian contributions in question for the guidance of the Delegation. Since, however, neither the Prime Minister, Mr. Martin, nor you will be able to attend that meeting, it seemed preferable not to place the matter before Cabinet this week. Although the Prime Minister will be able to attend next week, Mr. Harris will not be available. His officials have informed us that he would wish to be present when this subject is considered. In these circumstances we plan, subject to your approval, to place the draft submission before Cabinet during the first week of October.

I should be grateful for your views on our suggested timing and on the contents of the draft submission.

A copy of the draft submission, together with an explanatory note, is being sent to the Prime Minister for his information.

Yours sincerely,

CONTRIBUTIONS TO UNITED NATIONS RELIEF AND ASSISTANCE PROGRAMMES

You will recall that in my memorandum of September 14 (copy attached) I informed you that it was likely that officials of the Department of Finance would recommend to Mr. Harris that the contributions to UNRWA and the Expanded Technical Assistance Programme (ETAP) should be appreciably lower than the contributions envisaged by this Department. You indicated marginally that a comprehensive submission should be prepared for Cabinet recommending contributions at the levels contemplated in this Department, namely:

(i) UNKRA	$750,000
(ii) UNICEF	$600,000
(iii) UNRWA	$500,000
(iv) ETAP	$2.5 million.

2. Subsequently it was confirmed that Mr. Harris would argue against the amounts proposed for UNRWA and ETAP. Accordingly I wrote to you in New York on September 21 and enclosed a copy of the draft comprehensive submission that had been prepared in accordance with your wishes. I explained that, since neither the Prime Minister, Mr. Martin nor you would be able to attend the Cabinet Meeting on September 22, while Mr. Harris would not be available for the following meeting. I planned to have the submission placed before Cabinet during the first week of October. I also said that I would welcome your views on the suggested timing and on the content of the draft submission. A copy of my letter is attached for your ready reference.

3. At the same time a memorandum was sent to the Prime Minister (copy attached)† to inform him that the submission would likely be made in the first week of October. He was asked whether, in the event that you could not be present, he would wish to make the submission himself or would suggest that it be further delayed until your return.

4. When it became apparent that you would not be available for the Cabinet Meeting on October 6, it was ascertained by telephone that the Prime Minister would make the submission on your behalf. The draft was, therefore, completed in final form (copy attached),† and sent to the Privy Council Office for inclusion on the agenda for that meeting. A copy of the submission in final form was also sent to Mr. St. Laurent under cover of a memorandum mentioning that he had indicated that he would act in your absence.

5. I understand that at the meeting on October 6 Mr. Harris said that he wished to oppose parts of the submission and that he was reluctant to do so in your absence. Accordingly there was no discussion on the submission and consideration of this subject has been held over until you can be present.

6. Decisions on the size of the contributions to be made to the programmes in question are now a matter of some urgency, not only since this information would be useful to our Delegation at the General Assembly, but also so that the departmental estimates may be completed. In these circumstances I hope it will be possible for you to attend the next Cabinet Meeting on October 13.⁵⁵ Should this not be possible you might wish to arrange for this submission to be made on your behalf by the Minister who will be acting for you at that time.

À sa réunion du 13 octobre 1954, le Cabinet a décidé que Harris et Pearson devaient poursuivre la discussion de la proposition.

At the meeting of October 13, 1954, Cabinet decided that Harris and Pearson should discuss the submission further.

UNITED NATIONS RELIEF AND ASSISTANCE PROGRAMMES; CANADIAN PARTICIPATION

59. The Secretary of State for External Affairs submitted recommendations for Canadian participation in four United Nations relief and assistance programmes. The agencies concerned were the Korean Reconstruction Agency (U.N.K.R.A.), the Children's Fund (U.N.I.C.E.F.), the Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees (U.N.R.W.A.) and the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance to Underdeveloped Countries (E.T.A.P.).

In 1950, the government had agreed to make a total contribution not to exceed $8 million for U.N.K.R.A. Subsequently, when it became apparent that the agency's total budget would not be met, Canada made available $7.25 million rather than the full amount of $8 million. At the 8th Session of the General Assembly of the United Nations, an overall target for U.N.K.R.A.'s programmes of $266 million had been approved but there were indications that the total amount of contributions received would not be as great as hoped for and, in fact, the results therefore had been disappointing. Efforts had been made to secure payments from contributing countries for the full amount of this programme, but several countries thought the plan unrealistic and the United States had proposed a less ambitious alternative amounting to a total of $44.9 million. It would be unwise not to continue in the civil fields a substantial measure of aid to complete the effort which has been made in the military fields in Korea. Accordingly, the U.S. proposal was welcome as a means of avoiding the possibility that U.N.K.R.A. might be obliged to terminate its activities without having completed its original programme. It was the present intention to proceed on the assumption that no further contributions would be made after the fiscal year 1955-56. The $44.9 million total suggested included contributions from the United Kingdom, Australia and Canada of $9.9 million with most of the balance being made up by the U.S. Approximately $7 million would comprise the unpaid portion of previous United Kingdom and Australian pledges, leaving a gap of about $3 million to be filled by increased contributions from those countries and a further contribution from Canada. The balance of the original $8 million authorized, or $750,000, would appear to be a reasonable share of the gap of $3 million, and the Minister recommended that such a contribution be made at this time.

U.N.I.C.E.F. commanded a large measure of support in Canada and under efficient administration, had made a positive contribution towards meeting the problem it was set up to overcome. The Funds target was $20 million but, despite steady increases in contributions of various participating governments, it had not been possible to reach that amount and a number of useful projects had been denied assistance. The U.S. contributions were based on a matching formula of 60-40 and it would appear that unless contributions from the other member countries were increased, the fund would not be able to avail itself of the $8 million the U.S. Congress seemed prepared to provide. In the circumstance, he recommended that Canada increase its contribution this year to $600,000 from the $500,000 granted in past years.

For the current year, the government had agreed to a contribution of $500,000 for U.N.R.W.A. In doing so, the view was expressed that continued Canadian participation in assisting in the financing of this Agency would depend upon the progress made towards the final solution of the refugee problem. The ultimate responsibility rested, however, with Israel and the Arab States, the Conciliation Commission of Palestine and U.N.R.W.A. Though Israel had acknowledged its obligations to compensate refugees for properties the Israelis had taken over, the government had, as yet, not begun any payments. Little progress had been made in the re-settlement of refugees in the Sinai Peninsula, but agreement had been reached in principle by the Arab nations concerned and Israel to the development of the Jordan-Yarmuk Basin so that a large quantity of land could be irrigated and made fit for habitation by a considerable number of refugees. There were hopes that the new Director of U.N.R.W.A. would operate it more effectively. The Truce Supervision Organization was now led by a Canadian and, although this body had no responsibility for trying to achieve a settlement of the refugee problem, its work was important in preventing a possible breakdown of security. On the whole, there appeared to be some indications of progress in solving this difficult problem. For this reason and the fact that Canadian diplomatic missions would be opened in the Middle East in the near future, he recommended that a further contribution of $500,000 be made to the programme.

Canada had made several contributions to the programme of technical assistance to underdeveloped countries (E.T.A.P.) and last year had almost doubled the amount made available for the previous period. Of all the United Nations programmes it was thought that this one had the widest public appeal and offered one of the best opportunities for assisting effectively the economically less well-developed countries to overcome their problems and to raise the low standard of living of their peoples. The increase in Canada's contributions was of direct benefit last year in helping to avoid a serious curtailment in the programme's activities. In the past year, a number of administrative and financial improvements had been made and at the same time requests for assistance had grown. There was broad agreement that a real and pressing need existed for an upward revision of contributions if the pace of the existing programme was to be maintained. A further increase in Canada's contribution would help to meet the increasing volume of requests for assistance, satisfy a number of representations made in Canada for increased support of this sort of thing, reinforce Colombo Plan operations and set an example to other countries to increase their contributions. He recommended that the Canadian contribution be set at $2.5 million for the next year.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, Oct. 4, 1954—Cab. Doc. 218-54).†

60. Mr. Pearson added that there were two general points he thought should be kept in mind in considering these recommendations. The first was that mutual aid for military purposes would probably decrease in the forthcoming fiscal year and there might, therefore, be more funds available for more peaceful uses. Secondly, those responsible for the spending of Canadian funds contributed to U.N. programmes had seen to it that a good proportion of those funds and of the money made available by other nations had been spent in Canada.

Following discussions with the Minister of Finance, he now proposed that the contribution to U.N.I.C.E.F. remain the same as for the previous year, that is at $500,000, and that the suggested contribution for E.T.A.P. be set at $2 million rather than $2.5 million.

61. In the course of discussion, the following points emerged:

(a) The Korean situation remained dangerous, particularly because of the intransigent attitude of President Rhee on the question of reunification. This fact, together with Mr. Rhee's views as to how the money allotted for rehabilitation purposes should be spent, might lead to a complete breakdown of the programme, with the result that no contributions would be necessary.

(b) The Middle East was now the most explosive area in the world and, if assistance for the refugees was not continued, serious incidents on a large scale might occur. While little progress had been made in dealing with the problem, the political atmosphere had, nevertheless, improved slightly. The money was needed to keep people alive. Israel had recently agreed, in principle, to the release for relief purposes of $6 million belonging to some of the refugees. On the other hand, the governments in the area, and particularly Israel, had not taken all the steps they should to alleviate the conditions of the refugees. Their number was growing by natural increase, and if the present situation were allowed to continue, contributions might be required for ever. In the circumstances, it might be desirable to cut the proposed grant to a token amount as a gesture of protest, because so little had been done.

(c) There had been some feeling that the U.N. technical assistance programmes had been badly administered. This was not the case now. The Agency was doing good work and, as far as it was possible to ascertain the money provided was being well spent. Of all the international programmes this one had the most promise in helping to meet the problems of the underdeveloped countries. On the other hand, the increase recommended, even though it had been revised downward, was a substantial one, having in mind the increase in contribution made last year and the efforts of other nations associated with E.T.A.P. There had been suggestions that Canada's contribution to the Colombo Plan might also be increased. These suggestions and the proposal for E.T.A.P. under consideration might be studied in relation to each other before any decisions with respect to either of them were reached.

(d) The government was now faced with a probable budget deficit of $100 million this year. If business conditions remained as they were now throughout the next year, the deficit for 1955-56 might be of the order of $200 million. In the circumstances, it would be desirable to make as few commitments for increases in expenditures as was possible.

62. The Cabinet noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding contributions to United Nations relief and assistance programmes and agreed:

(a) that, subject to assurances from the governments of the United Kingdom and Australia that they would be prepared to contribute proportionate amounts to meet the gap of the additional $3 million required to implement the United States proposal for the 1954-55 programme, the Canadian Representative to the United Nations be authorized to announce the intention of the Canadian government to seek parliamentary approval for a further contribution to the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency of $750,000;

(b) that authorization be given to announce the government's intention to seek Parliamentary approval for a contribution to the United Nations Children's Fund for the year 1955-56 of $500,000; and that the fund be encouraged to continue its favourable record of purchases in Canada;

(c) that authorization be given to announce the government's intention to seek parliamentary approval for a contribution of $500,000 to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine for its financial year 1954-55, on the understanding that payment of the Canadian contribution be made subject to informal assurances by the Agency that this contribution would be used, as far as practicable, for the procurement in Canada of the commodities required; and,

(d) a decision be deferred on the size of the contribution to be made to the United Nations Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance to Underdeveloped Countries pending further consideration of the matter by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Finance.

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO THE UNITED NATIONS TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAMME

We have had further discussions with officials in the Department of Finance with a view to clarifying the rather general conclusion reached by Cabinet on this subject. In the light of these exchanges we would suggest that you might discuss with Mr. Harris before your departure this afternoon the possibility of sending instructions to the Delegation on the following lines:

(a) The Delegation should indicate the willingness of the Canadian Government to maintain its contribution at last year's level, i.e. $1,500,000 U.S. In this connection, the Delegation might observe that it is naturally expected that the contributions of other countries will be on a scale which will permit of an effective programme.

(b) The Delegation should indicate further that the Canadian Government would be prepared to consider increasing its contribution by a maximum of $500,000 U.S. at a rate of $100,000 for every million by which the total exceeds $25 million. The Delegation might observe that the reason for offering this additional amount when our contribution is already relatively high is that the Canadian Government desires to underline the importance of securing as large contributions as possible from those countries which may be able to do more than they are doing for this U.N. programme.

We understand that Mr. Harris is willing to accept (a) above but may not be ready to commit himself to (b) at least until the budgetary prospect is clearer. You may, nevertheless, wish to persuade him that if we are likely to increase our contribution in the end, it would be best to say so now in order to encourage other countries to contribute more than they now plan to.

It is hard to see how an offer of this kind could have any very serious budgetary consequences. Even if, as seems unlikely, the whole of the $500,000 were to be required, the direct effect on a budget of $4 or $5 billion could scarcely be significant. Any indirect effects on the budget would also probably not be substantial as this conditional increase in our contribution could hardly be used as a precedent for other departments in pressing claims for additional funds.

If Mr. Harris is quite unwilling to accept at this time instructions along the lines of paragraph (b), you might get him to agree that the Delegation should at least be informed that in the event of total pledges exceeding $25 million, the Canadian Government would be prepared to consider increasing its contribution. The Delegation might also be given permission to mention this possibility in private to other delegations without, however, indicating by exactly how much we might be willing to raise our contribution. The Delegation would then be expected to advise us of the total reached in order that the Government might determine at that time what would be the appropriate increase in our subscription.

Finance officials have spoken with Mr. Harris and he will be in a position to discuss the matter with you this afternoon if you can find an opportunity to call him.

UNITED NATIONS; CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO EXPANDED PROGRAMME OF TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE TO UNDERDEVELOPED COUNTRIES

17. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that, in accordance with the decision at the meeting of October 28th, 1954, he and the Minister of Finance had discussed further the question of the Canadian contribution to the United Nations Expanded Technical Assistance Programme to Underdeveloped Countries for 1955. It was now suggested that the Canadian representatives be authorized to announce the intention of Canada to contribute $1.5 million, provided contributions by other countries were substantial enough to ensure successful continuance of the programme. It was not intended, however, to provide immediately in the estimates for more than $850,000; it being understood that, if contributions of other countries were as high as expected, the balance required to bring the Canadian contribution to $1.5 million would be sought in the supplementary estimates. It was also proposed that, if contributions by other countries were very substantial, the government might reconsider its decision with a view possibly to increasing its contribution beyond $1.5 million.

18. The Cabinet agreed,

(a) that the Canadian representatives at the Fifth Pledging Conference of the United Nations Expanded Technical Assistance Programme for Underdeveloped Countries be authorized to indicate that the Canadian government was prepared to contribute $1.5 million to the programme for 1955, provided contributions were made by other countries in sufficient volume to ensure the continued success of the programme;

(b) that, for the time being, the sum of $850,000 be provided in the main estimates for this purpose; it being understood that, if circumstances warranted it, the balance of the moneys required to bring the Canadian contribution to $1.5 million would be sought in supplementary estimates; and,

(c) that, should other countries make total contributions substantially in excess of what was now anticipated, the desirability of increasing the Canadian contribution to the programme beyond $1.5 million would be reconsidered.

PROPOSALS TO DEFER THE REVIEW SESSION OF GATT

Exploratory discussions on the future of GATT and commercial policy took place between members of the United States State Department and a group of our own officials, in Ottawa, on May 26 and 27.⁵⁶ An informal record of these discussions has been circulated to interested departments.

The Americans took the position that it is desirable to proceed in November with the Review Session of GATT, even if the position of Congress is insubstantial and disappointing with regard to the future of United States foreign economic policy. The Americans evidently hope to submit an internationally negotiated parcel of proposals to a more receptive Congress in 1955.

In these discussions, Canadians expressed alarm at the prospect of commending the Review Session in circumstances in which the United States would be unable to increase its own commitments with respect to any part of GATT and in which it would be withdrawing from its present level of commitments in certain important respects, notably agricultural import controls. The Canadian officials also expressed distaste for getting involved in such important negotiations with the United States Administration, in advance of any indication whatsoever of Congressional willingness to accept the results. Mainly for these reasons, the Canadians felt it would be desirable to press for a delay in the Review Session of GATT until about the end of the first quarter of 1955, to provide additional time for Congress to consider the President's proposals.

In advance of the forthcoming meetings of the United Kingdom - Canada Continuing Committee, it is desirable that the above position be reviewed by the Inter-departmental Committee on External Trade Policy. It is clear that any position officially adopted on the timing of the Review Session of GATT should be sufficiently flexible to be revised in the light of developments in the United States. The Committee will also wish to bear in mind the possibility of various overseas countries moving toward convertibility and the desirability of adjusting the timing and substance of the GATT Review to the constructive needs of such countries. In the Collective Approach, it was made clear that the United Kingdom would wish, as part of a convertibility operation, to reach firm understandings with other important trading countries on the subject of the rules of trade during a transitional period.⁵⁷ In reaching our own decision about the timing of the Review Session of GATT, therefore, it is desirable to explore with the United Kingdom the relationship of the Review Session to a convertibility operation.

A separate memorandum has been circulated by the Department of Finance, on the subject of Tariff Negotiations under GATT, including the re-negotiation of selected items now included in GATT schedules.

COMMERCIAL POLICY DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES OFFICIALS

After a frank exchange of views, which were particularly divergent on the timetable for "reviewing" the GATT, the United States team left for Washington in the words of their leader "severely tested". We cannot say what impact may have been made on the State Department officials but we expect they are now reappraising the case which they expounded in Ottawa for renegotiating GATT this Fall. For our part, we continue to have very grave doubts about the wisdom of attempting the revision of GATT at this time. This memorandum provides an outline of the discussions — with as much detail of the specific proposals for rewriting the General Agreement as appears useful in the circumstances.

2. Evans said that their proposals concerning the timetable for the Review of the General Agreement were Administration views as such, but that their specific proposals for various parts of the General Agreement had not as yet been discussed with other agencies nor with Administration's political leaders.

Timetable for Review of the GATT

3. Evans declared that it had been decided in the White House both to seek a renegotiation of the organisational provisions of the General Agreement and to make at least a start on the substantive provisions this fall. The United States would propose that the Intersessional Committee meet this summer for a very preliminary exchange of views and that the Review Session commence in the second week of November.

4. Evans explained that the Administration wished to submit the renegotiated organisational provisions of the General Agreement to Congress early next year. He inferred that it might well be of some assistance to the Administration in obtaining a three year Trade Agreements Act in 1955 if the organisational provisions of GATT were already in a form which Congress could accept; and he suggested that the alternative was that a three year act might be jeopardised. He also saw other reasons for proceeding with the review this fall. The following developments would be taking place:

(a) In OEEC further progress would be made in considering the intra-European trade rules which would apply as countries moved towards convertibility or went convertible;

(b) The United Kingdom and the United States would be discussing standby arrangements for sterling convertibility.

These developments and the GATT Review are all closely related and if some progress were not made on each, it would be difficult to conclude any one of them. Finally, Evans observed that the State Department was worried at the possibility that those who had supported a liberal commercial policy would lose interest and heart if nothing seemed to be happening on the GATT this year.

5. We indicated that in our opinion this fall appeared to be an inopportune time to go ahead with the Review Session for several reasons:

(a) Canada and the United States represented the element in GATT which wanted high standards of commercial behaviour. Hitherto progress in this direction had been made at a time when U.S. commercial policy generally appeared encouraging to other countries and there were prospects of expanding trade owing to the U.S. power to negotiate tariff reduction. Now, however, the U.S. Administration appeared to have suffered a severe defeat. What had been described as the most important element of its program in the field of foreign economic policy had been set aside. While opinions might differ about the practical value of the contents of the Trade Agreements Bill, the fact that the Administration had acquiesced in the shelving of it appeared ominous to the outside world. Other countries might be justified in wondering whether the Administration would be in a better position next year than now to obtain necessary legislation. In this atmosphere (which was also affected by uncertainty about possible "escape clause" actions) it was hardly likely that other countries would be prepared to accept a tightening of the trade rules. Experience showed that it was very difficult to conclude satisfactory negotiations on these matters when there was not a fairly good idea of what the United States might do.

(b) To endeavour to renegotiate the GATT in this climate would be a very difficult exercise which might do real harm to the General Agreement. Moreover, the United States would be entering into such negotiations with the avowed intention of subtracting from its obligations on both the organisational and substantive sides. Previously the United States had been able not merely to move forward but in fact to provide some leadership. The GATT is a finely balanced instrument and it would seem likely that other countries might well use the Review in order to lessen their own obligations. The net effect might approach a disaster.

(c) The U.S. proposals concerning the agricultural provisions were for us perhaps the most troublesome feature of the circumstances which would exist at a review session this fall. International trade is becoming more competitive. The United States would be asking other countries to bind themselves concerning manufactures but to leave the United States free on agricultural products. Considering the nature of Canadian trade this was hardly a program which could be readily sold to public opinion here — particularly if there was no positive element in the package. There would have to be a reasonably balanced deal.

6. Evans did not dissent from our views. He could only take careful aim with what weapons he had. He observed that the United States program was not entirely negative and their "subtractions" from GATT would likely be modest. They would hope to make the GATT a more effective instrument both by strengthening the balance of payments clauses and by the United States possibly accepting GATT as a full fledged international organisation with well-defined procedures and with an effective secretariat. Rosensen observed, perhaps significantly, that account must also be taken of what the United States might be doing outside the GATT. If the United States supported convertibility for sterling this would be a forward movement and could provide a very favourable outlook. In such circumstances the major trading countries might be prepared (we thought the word he implied was "induced") to proceed with the GATT review.

7. We suggested that countries might not be ready in November to define their attitudes to the new long term trading rules and that it was hardly likely that November would provide the atmosphere which the United States side suggested might prevail.

8. There was some discussion about whether it appeared feasible to proceed with a review of the organisational provisions without getting into the substantive provisions. If such a separation was possible it might appear more feasible to have at least a partial review this autumn. This discussion was inconclusive but the following points emerged:

(1) A review of the organisational and substantive provisions could not be entirely divorced, largely because some of the important substantive provisions (i.e. Balance of payments and economic development) involved procedures which would be affected by the proposals for modifying the organisational provisions;

(2) Some sort of start might be made on both the organisational and substantive provisions — which might be enough to show the U.S. Congress in what direction the Review was moving.

(3) A renegotiation of some of the provisions might be completed this fall but accepted only ad referendum.

The United States Proposals Concerning the Organisational Provisions

9. The exposition by the State Department team was very helpful and it removed or reduced some of our doubts about the United States proposals. The State Department have in mind a fairly tight criterion which would have to be met before a contracting party could stand aside from a majority or a two-thirds decision. As Evans explained the criterion, the decision which the Contracting Parties were taking would have to alter explicitly a specific right or obligation in the basic contract in a manner which would materially affect the minority contracting party. The two main provisions of GATT involved were waivers and economic development measures affecting items in the schedules. In such circumstances, and only in such circumstances, the contracting party affected would have the right to terminate on a bilateral basis its obligations towards the contracting party obtaining the waiver (while continuing to be a member and to have a voice in GATT discussions including those affecting the other contracting party). Evans observed that such a termination was so drastic that it seemed unlikely that countries would go so far unless a very important right was affected. (The majority would be reluctant to place a country in a position where it would have cause to resort to such action, and the Contracting Party itself might even then hesitate to avail itself of the right of terminating its obligations unless the case was a very serious one.) The United States side pointed out that in most instances it would not be legally possible to terminate obligations on a discriminatory basis since old most-favoured-nation agreements would come into play in the event of any suspension of obligations under the GATT and would prevent such discrimination.

10. From this discussion it appeared that the cases in which United States would be unwilling to subject itself to the majority opinion of the Contracting Parties might be more limited than had been expected. In respect of most provisions in the GATT (e.g. balance of payments, nullification and impairment, etc.) they would hope that sufficiently precise standards could be incorporated in the organisational instrument (or possibly in the substantive provisions) that the Contracting Parties would merely have to determine whether those standards were being lived up to. The United States would apparently in those cases be prepared to be bound by such collective determination and to comply with any procedures for enforcing these standards (including any necessary consultations). They would also be willing to have the Contracting Parties given considerable powers of interpretation and to have the Contracting Parties make recommendations for the consideration of governments on almost any subject. The "let out" which they would require would be only in the case of waivers and closely analogous provisions.

The Balance of Payments Provisions

11. The United States team explained their "highly tentative" proposals in considerable detail. With the United States' general objectives there was of course no disagreement. These proposals include

(1) replacing the present unsatisfactory "objective" criteria (e.g. level of reserves) by procedures which could take account of underlying conditions and not merely symptoms;

(2) getting the important trading countries out from Article XIV of the I.M.F. to Article VIII so that countries going convertible would not have to fear new quota restrictions, or countries might undertake not to use for three years Article XIV without prior approval of the Fund;⁵⁸

(3) obtaining the abolition of existing restrictions over a further period — possibly three years;

(4) taking care of the special case of the underdeveloped countries under Article VIII; and

(5) devising some means of closer cooperation between GATT and the Fund.

12. Under the arrangements in (3) above the State Department is considering two approaches, one through I.M.F. and the other through GATT. The U.S. team agreed that the form and method by which joint GATT-IMF consideration might be given to these questions appeared to raise several problems.

(a) the criteria by which the "level of restrictions" might be judged posed a formidable problem and it was not evident that the appropriate "level" could be determined without regard to the nature or composition of any proposed list of restrictions. Internal policies would certainly have to be examined.

(b) The IMF and the GATT had different forms of voting and the establishment of any form of joint consultation would tend to raise certain juridical problems, particularly as to the relationship of any joint body to the Fund. The extent to which conclusions of any joint body would be reviewed by, or could be appealed to, the full GATT and Fund membership would have to be considered. The views of the Fund and GATT might then have to be reconciled if they differed. The State Department have not thought these problems out yet.

(c) For the Fund to determine that the transitional period is at an end might not be satisfactory unless all the important trading countries agreed; and it appeared unlikely that they would voluntarily terminate the transitional arrangements and accept the Fund as presently constituted (e.g. weighted votes, and full time officials without responsibilities in their own capitals) as the final arbiter on restrictions.

(d) From the point of view of timing we also observed that it could hardly be expected that the countries with restrictions would agree to any new regime until the new trade rules had been agreed. In particular the countries which were not going convertible would find little attraction in the proposed new arrangements which would further limit their freedom without giving them any apparent benefits.

The Agricultural Provisions

13. Evans declared that the State Department's objective (which in fact was the original intention of Section 22 of the A.A.A.⁵⁹ though it had not taken this form) was to obtain agreement to the following "fair share" principle. If as a result of a domestic program imports are entering in larger volume than if there were no such program, imports could be restricted to the level at which they might reasonably be expected to have entered in the absence of a domestic program (which would normally be the amount of imports in a previous representative period). Evans said that an attempt would have to be made to revise Section 22 accordingly. The GATT might therefore be renegotiated along these lines this fall, the United States would reserve its position, and hope to be able to accept the new provisions when, and if, new legislation replaces Section 22. Alternatively, (as the U.K. has apparently suggested) this Article might be left temporarily in its present form in any GATT emerging from the proposed Review and the U.S. might merely attach a reservation to it until it can be renegotiated.

14. We pointed out that apart from the problem of defining a "fair share" the United States would be seeking a concession from the present provisions in the GATT or would be leaving a good deal of uncertainty concerning their attitude towards restrictions on agricultural imports. We agreed that it would be helpful to obtain some well-defined concept of imports which would not be interfered with; but countries would be looking for some additional commitment to restore the balance of the Agreement. At present agricultural export subsidization was of grave concern and we wondered whether the United States could not enter into some international commitment along the lines of the provisions in Section 550 of MSA not to interfere with normal marketing.

Section 22 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act required the President to impose restrictions on imports of agricultural products which interfered with certain agricultural programs, including those designed to restrict domestic production and marketing, and to support domestic prices.

15. Evans saw logic in this proposal but he suggested that any effort to obtain such commitments in present circumstances would do more harm than good. He thought the Administration could accomplish more by administrative action and if they tried to get some international commitment they might be over-ruled by Congress. Weiss said that United Kingdom officials had indicated that they did not want the subsidy question opened — owing to the pressure to apply quotas in the U.K. to reduce the agricultural subsidies in the budget.

Tariff Negotiations with Japan

16. Evans thought that there was some possibility that the Ways and Means Committee would report out the Trade Agreements Bill without any strings attached. At least this was the White House intention. No consideration had been given as yet to fitting negotiations with Japan into the GATT timetable. He hoped however that a multilateral negotiation with Japan might be feasible. Negotiations would take at least two and a half months and an announcement in the United States would have to be made towards the end of August.

17. We indicated that while we would welcome Japan's accession to GATT, we were about to extend to Japan low most-favoured-nation rates; and inasmuch as Japan was not the principal supplier for many items of interest to us there would not be much scope for direct negotiation. The scope for reductions might however be widened if there were concurrent negotiations with the United States on items of interest to Japan. Evans did not appear to rule this possibility out.

18. Evans also remarked that if there appeared to be any great difficulty for the Administration in obtaining Congressional passage of both the one year extension of the Trade Agreements Act and the Customs Tariff Simplification Bill the Administration would opt for the former. He thought the chances were good for the Jenkins' bill on valuation.

Further Binding of the Tariff Schedules

19. We pointed out that consideration would have to be given to the future status of the Schedules before their present period of validity expired. The Schedules have been extended until June 30, 1955, but at the Eighth Session of the Contracting Parties it had seemed to us that a number of countries were anxious to make adjustments in their tariffs. It seemed likely that there would be more pressure than there was last year for adjustments in the schedules; and this pressure might endanger tariff stability. The United States team agreed that further steps to ensure the continuation of the Schedules should be considered before too long, although the exact timing might depend upon the prospects for holding new negotiations.

20. We had a word with Evans about the possibility of a postponement of the Intersessional Meeting. Evans was non-committal but indicated that he would give the matter further consideration during the next few weeks — (no doubt in conjunction with a re-examination of the timetable for the Review Session).

GATT TARIFF SCHEDULES

1. The GATT tariff schedules incorporate all the concessions, including bindings, granted in the course of the three rounds of tariff bargaining held at Geneva, Annecy and Torquay. There is a separate schedule for each Contracting Party. These schedules lay down the maximum tariff rates which Contracting Parties may apply to one another's trade.

2. The tariff schedules were initially bound for a period of three years — until January 1, 1951. Since that time, they have been extended for further periods; at Torquay they were bound until January 1, 1954; and at the last Session they were bound for a further period of 18 months. Under present arrangements, therefore, the GATT tariff schedules are firmly bound until July 1, 1955.

3. The decision of the Contracting Parties last fall to extend the schedules was taken in the expectation that arrangements would be made during 1954 for a further round of tariff bargaining, for negotiations with Japan, and also for a re-examination of present schedules. This tentative timetable was predicated on the hope that the United States would obtain new tariff-cutting powers early enough to participate in this programme. As events have turned out it is now virtually certain that the United States will not be in a position to engage in a further round of tariff negotiations to fit in with the July 1, 1955 expiry of the assured life of the present schedules. It is not yet clear what the United States position will be with respect to negotiations with Japan. Regardless of what the position may be respecting new negotiations and negotiations for Japanese accession, a decision will have to be taken on the future status of existing tariff schedules.

4. The discussion which follows on various alternative methods for dealing with this problem is based on the assumption that the United States Congress will extend the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act for one year, with or without a rider that the tariff-cutting powers are not to be used for any major negotiations (i.e., negotiations with Japan). Should events turn out otherwise, this whole matter will, of course, have to be reconsidered.

Status of the Present Tariff Schedules

5. There are three possible methods of dealing with the future status of the existing tariff schedules:

(1) Allow the provisions of Article XXVIII to come into operation after July 1, 1955. This would mean that the tariff schedules would remain in effect subject to the right of Contracting Parties to withdraw or modify bound rates in accordance with the procedures of that Article. It should be pointed out that in the last analysis Article XXVIII allows countries to modify tariff rates unilaterally.

(2) Extend the present schedules without any modification at all for a further firm period.

(3) Renegotiate the present schedules and bind the results for a firm period. In such negotiations countries would endeavour to maintain a general level of reciprocal concessions not less favourable to trade than that provided for in the present agreements. Following such a negotiation the modified tariff schedules would be extended for a further period of say two or three years.

6. The simplest method would be to allow Article XXVIII to come into operation, since this would not require any positive action or decisions. This approach, however, has serious disadvantages. It would further impair the stability of tariff rates which has been one of the principal achievements of the GATT. Article XXVIII would establish a new escape clause which does not have the safeguards contained in the present Article XIX. The only sanction to discourage countries from making excessive use of its provisions is the right of other countries to withdraw substantially equivalent concessions in cases where a satisfactory settlement is not reached. Withdrawals and counter-withdrawals could start an unravelling process with a progressive deterioration of the value of tariff bindings.

7. The second alternative, a simple extension of the present schedules without modification, while it would have obvious advantages, will not likely be acceptable to a number of countries. Discussions at the last Session indicated that quite a few countries will want to modify certain bound rates as soon as the next opportunity arises. These countries agreed to an 18-month extension with considerable reluctance and are not likely to agree to a further extension. In this connection it is relevant that Canada may also wish to modify certain bound items. On balance, therefore, it would seem reasonable to assume that present schedules will not be re-bound without some changes.

8. In the circumstances, the only realistic approach would seem to be to arrange for limited renegotiations prior to July 1, 1955. At best, such a process will be protracted and difficult, and if it is to be completed before next July it will be necessary to have a renegotiating Session not later than the spring of 1955. Arrangements can be made either at the next regular Session of GATT, or alternatively, the Intersessional Committee can be charged with the task of devising appropriate procedures.

9. The question arises as to what position Canada should take when this matter comes up for discussion at the fall Session. In the past, Canada has taken the lead in urging the extension of the schedules without modification. This would not be a realistic policy in present circumstances, either from the point of view of our own needs or the needs of other countries. At the same time it should not be necessary for us to take any initiatives in arranging for a re-examination of the schedules. It would seem reasonably safe to proceed on the expectation that the minimum requirements of other countries in this regard will provide sufficient scope for the limited adjustments required by Canada.

10. The foregoing analysis has been based on the view that Canada would derive trade benefits from the continued binding of GATT tariff schedules. Should it turn out, however, that the United States makes widespread and indiscriminate use of the Article XIX escape clause, this assumption may no longer be valid. In this event it would matter little if Article XXVIII is allowed to come into operation. We would no doubt wish, in such circumstances, to re-examine our position and to decide whether it would not be preferable for Canada to avoid what in effect are one-sided commitments with respect to tariff bindings.

Negotiations with Japan

11. Reports from Washington in the past few days suggest the possibility that the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act may be extended for a year in its present form, without restrictive riders. If this were to materialize the United States would be in a position to enter into meaningful tariff negotiations with Japan. Accordingly it may be useful to examine some of the problems involved, and the position which Canada might take with respect to Japanese negotiations.

12. It is the established practice under GATT that a new country accede only after extensive tariff negotiations. The acceding government is expected, in the course of such negotiations, to offer tariff concessions in payment for any new tariff reductions as well as for benefits accruing to it from the existing tariff schedules. Japan has been willing to pay appropriate "membership dues" for several years now but, thus far, has not been admitted to full membership.

13. At the Eighth Session arrangements were made for fuller participation by Japan in the GATT meetings and also for the application of GATT provisions, including the tariff schedules, between Japan and those Contracting Parties willing to do so. In return Japan agreed to bind a substantial part of its tariff in favour of those countries which were prepared to enter into this undertaking. This was intended to be a transitional arrangement pending tariff negotiations with Japan directed to its full membership. Some twenty-four countries, including Canada, have now entered into these transitional arrangements.

14. Canada has, in principle, favoured full Japanese membership. On the question of timing, however, we held the view that the effective absorption of Japan into the GATT trading community could be best achieved after multilateral tariff negotiations, in which the major trading countries, including the United States, took an effective part. This approach was supported by a large number of Contracting Parties, including the United Kingdom.

15. The present Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act provides authority to reduce tariffs by 50% of the 1945 rates. If extended without crippling limitations it would allow the United States to make significant concessions not only to Japan but also to third countries in part payment for concessions they make to Japan. In their broadest form these powers would seem to offer scope for meaningful tariff negotiations with Japan and also with countries which have not exhausted the possibilities for tariff concessions under the present R.T.A.A., i.e., the United Kingdom. Even the broadest interpretation, however, would only have limited value for Canada, since we have pretty well used up all the existing United States tariff-cutting powers. We would, of course, benefit indirectly from United States concessions to Japan and other countries.

16. The question is raised, how far Canada should get involved in direct tariff negotiations with Japan. On balance it would seem that there is not much scope for a tariff deal of this kind. Japan is, at present, chief supplier to Canada on less than a dozen relatively minor products. For most products which Japan would be interested in exporting to Canada, the United States is the chief supplier. We would hardly be willing to negotiate on such products in circumstances where the United States is not in a position to make concessions of direct value to us. Looking at the concessions which Japan might make to us, we are much more concerned with direct restrictions imposed by Japan than with her tariff, which is quite moderate. Furthermore, there is something to be said for holding back on further tariff concessions to Japan until Canadian industry has absorbed the effects of the substantial tariff reductions resulting from the extension of Most-Favoured-Nation treatment. It would seem therefore that any direct negotiations between Canada and Japan will likely be of a limited nature. Nevertheless it would be in our interest to encourage the broadest possible agreements between Japan and other countries in order to make maximum use of United States tariff-cutting powers.

I. GATT REVIEW SESSION; PROPOSAL TO DEFER UNTIL EARLY IN 1955

1. The Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce said that the Canadian members of the Canada-United Kingdom Continuing Committee on Trade, who were leaving at the end of the week for meetings in London, required guidance on the attitude they should take with United Kingdom officials about the timing of the Review Session of the GATT. His department and Finance had prepared memoranda respectively on proposals to defer the Review Session, and on the status of the tariff schedules.

2. Mr. Isbister said there was an increased feeling that it would be desirable to reconsider the date of the Review Session.

Meetings had been held in Ottawa on May 26 and May 27 with representatives of the United States State Department, and exploratory discussions on the future of the GATT and commercial policy took place. The Americans took the position that it was desirable to proceed with the Review Session in November, as planned, despite the disappointing position in the Congress. The Canadian officials, on the other hand, expressed alarm at commencing the Review Session in what they considered to be very unfavourable circumstances. The proposed Review Session had been timed to take place after the Randall Commission had reported and when the United States presumably would be implementing its recommendations. Now, however, it appeared fairly clear that little action, if any, would be taken at this Session of Congress on the President's important recommendations on trade policy.

The United States would be in the position of being unable to increase commitments with respect to GATT and would, indeed, be seeking withdrawals in certain important respects, notably with regard to the agricultural provisions. This would quite possibly lead to a chain reaction of withdrawals by other countries. The Canadian officials also expressed distress at the prospect of becoming involved in negotiations with the U.S. administration in advance of any Congressional willingness to accept even part of the results.

In the circumstances, it appeared desirable to defer the review until U.S. policy was firmer. It was clear that the U.S. officials were in retreat but they hoped that if the session was held as scheduled they might be able to present a programme to a more receptive Congress after the fall elections with some reasonable chance of favourable action being taken on at least a portion of it — in particular the three-year Trade Agreement Act with power to negotiate tariff reductions.

While it seemed desirable now to press for postponement of the Session, our attitude should be flexible in case of a change in the United States atmosphere. The possibility of various countries moving towards convertibility should also be borne in mind. In the collective approach, it was made clear that the U.K. would wish, as part of the convertibility operation, to reach firm understandings with other important trading nations on rules of trade during a transitional period. It was not known what these rules might be, nor the auspices under which they would be negotiated, and the timing of the Review Session of the GATT would in part depend on whether these rules were to be worked out under the GATT, or elsewhere. Canadian officials also were not aware of the degree of positive action on commercial policy in the United States which the British would regard as a pre-requisite to convertibility.

In reaching our own decision about the timing of the Review Session, it was therefore desirable to explore with the U.K. the possible relationship of the session to a convertibility operation.

With the foregoing in mind, Canadian officials at the Continuing Committee meetings might explore with the British — and perhaps later with the United States — the possibility of postponing the Review Session of the GATT.

(An explanatory memorandum — ICETP Document No. 166 — had been circulated).

3. Mr. Reisman said the United States wanted to go ahead with the Review Session as planned, for two reasons: to keep up what momentum existed, and to deal with the organizational provisions of the GATT.

Many Congressmen were hostile towards the GATT. It was a multilateral agreement embracing several bilateral arrangements and, by a majority vote, the parties to it could modify those bilateral arrangements entered into by the United States and other individual nations. There was a strong feeling in Congress that this should not be allowed to happen, and U.S. officials felt that, if the organizational provisions could be modified to prevent such action occurring, much Congressional antagonism toward the GATT would be removed. If the organizational aspect could be looked into independently, the United States might agree to a postponement of other substantive revisions.

4. Mr. Isbister said that considering organizational problems in relating to the Review Session would lead into many confusing issues about which we were not fully informed. It might be better, therefore, to base a decision solely on the question of the Review Session.

5. The Associate Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce asked if the review could be postponed indefinitely.

6. Mr. Isbister said that the tariff schedules had been bound to July 1, 1955. In advance of discussing their future, most countries would want to have a look at the substantive provisions of the Agreement. In suggesting a delay for the review, he was thinking of a postponement, say, until early 1955, and not indefinitely.

7. The Deputy Minister of National Revenue asked, if the Review Session were to be held in March, 1955, whether it would be completed before July and in advance of a round of tariff bargaining.

8. Mr. Isbister said he thought that if a positive programme were under way, countries concerned might agree to a further short binding of schedules until negotiations were completed.

9. Mr. Ritchie, in reply to a question from Mr. Sharp concerning the organizational provisions, said they were concerned with such matters as sanctions, waivers, and the like.

10. Mr. Sharp said it would seem difficult in these circumstances — if an attempt were made to negotiate on only the organizational provisions — to avoid getting into discussion on the agricultural Escape Clauses which were of vital interest to us and about which national representatives would have to know the policy of their respective governments.

11. The Deputy Governor of the Bank of Canada was under the impression that what the U.K. wished, in relation to a convertibility operation, was a fairly broad understanding on trade policies rather than a revision of specific rules. In the circumstances, he thought the United Kingdom would probably agree to a postponement of the Review Session.

12. Mr. Isbister agreed that the U.K. desire for a Review Session in November had probably disappeared because the Kean Bill, which embodied the main recommendations of the Randall Commission and the provision for the Executive to reduce tariffs by 15% over a three-year period, was not being proceeded with at this Session of Congress.

13. The Chairman said that the central question appeared to be whether the U.S. representatives at a Review Session would have no clear indication of Congressional policy or whether they attended with some firm directive which, if accepted at the meeting, might be presented to the Congress with a reasonable expectation of it being ultimately approved.

14. Mr. Rasminsky said that if the Session were to be held in November as planned, U.S. representatives would wish to change the organization in two ways: They would wish to remove from the Articles of the Agreement anything which was repugnant to their domestic legislation and to strengthen the balance of payments provisions, substituting procedures which would require prior approval of participating countries for the present objective tests. The United States, of course, was the one country which would be unlikely to ever have to resort to the balance-of-payments provisions. In practice, this would mean writing into the GATT the restrictions now in the Agricultural Adjustments Act and the removal of executive authority to negotiate adjustments in the GATT arrangements which would affect the existing tariff concessions. The U.K. might, however, find a strengthening of the balance-of-payments provisions helpful in meeting difficulties which might occur in a move towards convertibility. There was not much hope for the negotiations, however, if the U.S. wanted to amend the GATT in the manner he had outlined.

15. Mr. Reisman felt that the U.S. had been thinking only of the sterling area and had not given much consideration to European, Latin American and certain Asian nations.

16. Mr. Ritchie said that if IMF funds were made available there might be a counter balance to the U.S. proposal.

17. Mr. Rasminsky did not think this would be too convincing, since countries which might obtain funds were not those who were concerned too directly with the possible changes.

18. Mr. Isbister raised another question in connection with timing of the Review Session. If negotiations were carried out ad referendum and the document which emerged was not accepted by Congress, there would be a real danger of complete confusion. A perfectly valid excuse to withdraw from the GATT would be presented to the countries concerned.

19. Mr. Sim said the arguments all seemed to favour delaying the Review Session, since there appeared to be nothing to lose — and there was a possibility of making some gains — by doing so.

20. The Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs agreed that the logical policy seemed to be to press for a delay with, however, a degree of flexibility in case the situation changed in the United States.

21. The Committee, after further discussion, agreed that the Canadian representatives at the forthcoming meeting of the Canada-United Kingdom Continuing Committee on Trade discuss with the U.K. authorities concerned the timing of the Review Session of the GATT, including the question of whether it would be desirable to postpone it until the spring of 1955, unless developments in the United States in the meantime tended to alter the situation, in which case the Canadian position would be reviewed; it being kept in mind that tariff schedules were bound only until July 1, 1955, and in any event it would be highly desirable to have a review of the substantive GATT provisions prior to the conclusion of another round of tariff bargaining.

II. STATUS OF GATT; TARIFF SCHEDULES

22. Mr. Plumptre said that, under present arrangements, GATT tariff schedules were bound until July 1, 1955. Regardless of the time of new negotiations and negotiations for Japanese accession, a decision would have to be taken on the future status of these schedules. There were three possible methods of dealing with them:

(a) To allow the provisions of Article XXVIII to come into operation after July 1, 1955. This would mean that the tariff schedules would remain in effect subject to the right of Contracting Parties to withdraw or modify bound rates in accordance with the procedures of the Article; in other words, tariff rates could be modified unilaterally.

(b) To extend the present schedules without any modification at all for a further firm period; or,

(c) to renegotiate the present schedules and bind the results for a firm period.

Although (a) would be the simplest method to adopt, it would have the serious disadvantage of further impairing the stability of tariff rates by the establishment of a new Escape Clause. Alternative (b) would provide a number of obvious advantages, but it would probably be unacceptable to a number of countries who had indicated that they would wish to modify certain bound rates as soon as opportunity arose. Canada itself might wish to modify tariffs on certain items.

In the circumstances, the most realistic approach appeared to be to arrange for limited renegotiation prior to July 1, 1955. In order to meet the timetable, the renegotiation Session would have to start not later than the spring of 1955. Arrangements could be made either at the next regular session of GATT or, alternatively, the Intersessional Committee could be charged with devising appropriate procedures.

The question arose as to what position Canada should take at the fall session when this matter would be discussed. It did not seem realistic to press for the extension of schedules without modification. At the same time, it should not be necessary to take any initiative in arranging for a wholesale re-examination of the schedules. It would seem therefore that it would be reasonably safe to proceed on the expectation that the minimum requirements of other countries for re-examining schedules would provide adequate scope for a small number of adjustments required by Canada. If, however, the U.S. were to make widespread use of the Article XIX Escape Clause, our whole position would have to be re-examined.

As far as negotiations with Japan were concerned, it appeared possible that the RTAA might be extended for a year in its present form and, if this were so, the U.S. could enter into meaningful negotiations with Japan.

At the last session of the GATT, arrangements had been made for fuller participation by Japan but it was held that the actual absorption of Japan into the GATT could be best achieved after multilateral tariff negotiations in which the major trading nations, including the U.S., took an effective part. Canada had used up for its own purposes most of the existing U.S. tariff cutting powers but we would benefit indirectly from U.S. concessions to Japan and other countries. It appeared that there was not much scope for Canada for tariff negotiations with Japan and, in any event, most-favoured-nation treatment had been extended to that country already. While it seemed therefore that direct negotiations between Canada and Japan would likely be of a limited nature, it would nevertheless be in our interest to encourage the broadest possible arrangements between Japan and other countries in order to make the maximum use of U.S. tariff cutting powers. We should, however, participate in any negotiations directed towards Japan's admission to the GATT if such negotiations did in fact occur.

(An explanatory memorandum — ICETP Document No. 167 — had been circulated).

23. The Deputy Governor of the Bank of Canada asked why existing schedules could not be rebound instead of risking the collapse of GATT by the renegotiation of all items.

24. Mr. Reisman said that many countries wanted to make adjustments in their rates so that renegotiation would probably be inevitable. We should bear in mind our own situation with respect to wool.

25. Mr. Isbister said that before the Torquay session several of the major trading countries had decided not to withdraw items from the existing schedules. If it were not that Canada hoped to make some withdrawals, it would be possible to suggest a similar restriction for the forthcoming session.

26. The Deputy Minister of National Revenue said that essentially the Canadian position would be one of rebinding. Such modifications as might be looked for would be comparatively modest and we should aim to fall back to the present situation as far as that was possible.

27. Mr. Isbister pointed out that if the few items of direct concern to Canada could be withdrawn under Article XIX, it would seem preferable to have a general rebinding at the negotiating session. The U.S. might be encouraged to take the same position, although the less use there was made of Article XIX the better. The reference to the Tariff Board on wool would not necessarily be prejudicial since it had not been entirely specific.

28. Mr. Reisman agreed that if major trading countries were willing to rebind their schedules, it might be possible to look into the few problem items that we had and work out understandings with the countries affected. It should be borne in mind, however, that if any progress were made on removing quantitative restrictions, there would undoubtedly be more pressure to raise tariffs.

The main benefits which had accrued to Canada in the multilateral negotiations over the past few years had been as a result of concessions from the U.S. If that country was to make extensive use of Article XIX, it would not matter much to us whether we had a general rebinding of the schedules or not.

29. Mr. Plumptre said everything should be done to avoid Article XXVIII coming into operation. Our most preferable tactics would be to work for a general rebinding, with an indication perhaps that on some items certain countries might wish to make freer use of Article XIX. So far as possible, we should avoid a general renegotiation.

30. The Committee, after further discussion, agreed to recommend that when the future status of the GATT tariff schedules was being considered, Canada should take the position that they should not be allowed to lapse with Article XXVIII coming into operation; that, rather than having a general renegotiation of schedules, there should be a rebinding for a further period, with some recourse, if necessary, to the use of Article XIX in certain specific cases or to an arrangement made similar to the one reached at the last regular session of GATT whereby certain limited revisions in tariffs could be allowed subject to the approval of the Contracting Parties.

COMMERCIAL POLICY DISCUSSIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES OFFICIALS
MAY 26 AND 27, 1954

I was interested in reading over the Note prepared in the Economic Division on the discussions with United States officials about the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. In this letter I wish to comment on paragraph 5 of that Note, which sets forth the reasons given by the Canadian officials for not going ahead this year with the review of GATT.

2. When I learned about the severe defeat suffered by the U.S. Administration in their attempt to secure enactment of the commercial policy recommendations of the Randall Commission, I shared the misgivings expressed by the Canadian officials regarding the difficulty of maintaining high standards of commercial behaviour at a time when the United States was not able to assert effective leadership. Since then, I have attended the meetings of the OEEC Examination Group on Convertibility. This has entirely altered my view regarding the prospects for the Review Session. I can now see that it would be a great mistake to postpone the review of GATT because in the United Kingdom view it has become one of the essential steps towards convertibility.

3. The United Kingdom appear to have given up their original intention of deferring the drafting of trade rules until the countries whose currencies become convertible have had some experience of the operation of convertibility. Sir Leslie Rowan, at the meetings to which I have referred, strongly expressed the view that the trade rules for world-wide application should be established by the forthcoming review of GATT. What the United Kingdom is now asking is that there should be a period of grace of one year from the time the currency of a country becomes convertible until that country is obligated to apply fully the new trade rules. In other words, the United Kingdom wants a period of one-year before it dismantles entirely its bulwark of restrictions on dollar imports. In the meantime, there would be a set of rules for the transitional period, which would be briefly set forth in the revised GATT, but could be provided for with greater precision in the OEEC Code of Liberalization, subject to such modifications as changing circumstances might dictate. Rowan endeavoured, without success, to obtain the agreement of the group to an endorsement of the principles set forth in Paragraph 15 of the United Kingdom paper on "Convertibility" (OEEC Document No. GMC (54)1) to be applicable to the review of GATT.

4. There was a distinct tendency on the part of the OEEC veterans, such as the Representatives of Belgium, Italy, and Switzerland, to have the OEEC made the organization responsible for the administration of the trade rules not only for the transitional period of grace but also for the long term. At the final meeting nearly all the countries on the Continent subscribed to this view for the reasons set forth in our letter No. 1737 of June 4.⁶⁰ I felt it incumbent on me to intervene on behalf of GATT, and Rowan endorsed what I said as representing the position of the United Kingdom. It became clear from private discussions that there would be no possibility of Congress approving the assumption by the United States of full membership in OEEC. Marjolin proposed the adherence of the other countries of the Commonwealth as Associate Members of the OEEC. Rowan pointed out in private conversation that there would be no possibility of the Asian members of the Commonwealth becoming associated with the OEEC nor could the United Kingdom agree to some members of the Commonwealth becoming Associate Members of the OEEC without others.

5. The firm stand taken by the United Kingdom means that in the coming review of GATT, the leadership in maintaining high standards of commercial behaviour will have passed from the United States to that country. We shall still be able to count on United States support, for what it is worth, for the maintenance of tariff stability, but in upholding the main principles of non-discrimination and the removal of quantitative import restrictions as well as in the attack on bilateral balancing of trade, it will be the United Kingdom that will provide the chief and the most effective leadership.

6. The transition from association with the United States to association with the United Kingdom in the leadership of GATT should present no great difficulties for Canada. We should welcome the change in the United Kingdom position from that of a reluctant and somewhat half-hearted partner to that of a leading exponent of our views. Whereas formerly the United States and Canada were out in front of the other countries, we shall now be associated with a large number of like-minded countries. Most of the other Commonwealth countries may be expected to respond to United Kingdom leadership. We should also have the full support of the Western European countries who expect to make their currencies convertible. After my speech, Mr. Schaffner, one of the principal economic officers of the Swiss Government, told me that what I had said indicated the possibility of Switzerland becoming a contracting party to the General Agreement. He said that if Rowan was correct in his forecast about the end of bilateral balancing of trade, all that Switzerland would require would be exceptions to permit them to continue bilateral deals with state-trading countries, e.g., those behind the Iron Curtain.

7. We are entering a new era in GATT in which the trade rules become more important than reductions in tariffs. It is in the latter field that United States leadership has been so essential and can not now be accorded at least until effect is given to the recommendations of the Randall Commission. I do not think we should yet despair of the United States. My testimony before the Randall Commission gave me the opportunity of seeing and hearing such dominant figures as Senator Millikin, the Chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, and Mr. Dan Reed, the Chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee. It is necessary to see and hear them in order to believe. Since then, I have not had much faith in the possibility of any favourable developments when action was dependent on the committees over which these two men presided. I was encouraged by the recent demonstration in favour of the recommendations of the Randall Commission put on by five Democratic Senators and Senator Morse. The balance of parties in Congress is so even that we must always keep in mind the possibility of a change in the Chairmanship of the two key committees.

8. The U.S. Administration attach importance to the organizational agreement of GATT being presented to Congress as part of one package, along with the Randall Commission's recommendations on commercial policy. I think it is incumbent on us to help them achieve this end.

9. We should be grateful in one sense that the Randall Commission's recommendations were not enacted this year. I was full of qualms about the swollen programme with two different kinds of tariff negotiations and a review of GATT all planned to take place within the space of a few months.

10. There is another factor which the Canadian officials may have overlooked, and that is the difficulty we shall have in maintaining the validity of the existing schedules to GATT beyond June 30, 1955. This will be one of the chief problems with which we will be confronted at the next session. It became clear at the last session that the majority of the contracting parties wanted a review of GATT at an early date. In particular, greater freedom must be accorded to the under-developed countries in their legitimate desires to promote the development of new industries. We should encourage them to resort to tariff action rather than the imposition of quantitative restrictions to achieve this end. If we are to retain their membership in GATT, we must, however, make exceptions in their favour when drafting the new trade rules (Article XVIII).

11. If, at the Intersessional Meeting in July, we were to propose a postponement of the review of GATT, I feel that this would lead to a weakening in the support for GATT of the under-developed countries. This would later be reflected in widespread resort to Article XXVIII when the validity of the existing schedules expires on June 30, 1955.

12. To sum up, I would state that we are irrevocably committed to a review of GATT late this year, and that any postponement would do more harm to GATT than the harm envisaged by the bankruptcy of United States policy. Moreover, the United Kingdom has come out strongly in favour of GATT in connection with the trade rules for the period after convertibility. They are prepared to undertake the revision of these trade rules at an early date. Although I believe they would prefer a review session commencing in January, they are now reconciled to one commencing in November.

13. In view of all this, I hope that the Canadian officials will feel that in their discussions with the United States officials they have made a useful demonstration against the bankruptcy of United States policy, but that they will agree that there can be no question of postponing the review session of GATT now contemplated for next November.

14. I am sending a copy of this letter to Mr. N.A. Robertson, High Commissioner for Canada in London, in order that he may bring it to the attention of the Canadian officials who will be attending the meetings of the Continuing Committee next week.

ITEM 1(C) — THE G.A.T.T.

Sir Frank Lee said that the U.K. side had two main reservations in discussing G.A.T.T. at this stage viz: (a) our thinking on what we should press for, or resist, at the next review of the G.A.T.T. was very far from complete; and (b) we required to do much more thinking about the trade aspects of the Collective Approach. In the U.K. nothing in the way of officials' preliminary views on the trade rules had yet been put to Ministers, but it was intended, some time in the summer, to send a paper to Commonwealth Governments as a prelude to high level talks early in October. He could not therefore say anything of a definitive nature at this stage.

As the Canadians knew, the U.K. hoped that other Commonwealth countries would be represented at a high policy level at the Commonwealth meeting of officials on 5th October. We regarded it as most important that before the review of the G.A.T.T. Commonwealth countries should together have had a thorough review of their policies in regard to the basic principles of the G.A.T.T. In addition to giving further consideration to the trade rules to be applied under the Collective Approach and to the changes in the G.A.T.T. that might be necessary to this end, the meeting might be expected to consider such major topics as strengthening the provisions relating to export subsidies, whether parts of the draft Havana Charter, e.g. those relating to employment policy, commodity policy and restrictive business practices, should be brought into the G.A.T.T., and if we or any other Commonwealth country wanted to raise the matter in any form (and he could not say whether or not the U.K. might want to do this) of Imperial Preference.

In considering the timetable the U.K. had been troubled by much uncertainty about what the U.S. would want; the U.K. hoped for a reasonable interval, after the October meeting, for Commonwealth officials to report to their Governments and secure firm instructions as to the line they should follow at Geneva. It appeared that in this regard the thinking of the U.S. Administration was dominated by their plans for securing Congressional approval for the reviewed G.A.T.T. and they were therefore anxious to start the review as early as possible in November. The U.K. had agreed with reluctance to fall in with this though from many points of view we would have much preferred to put off starting the review until early 1955. Our fear was that the U.S., in their anxiety to put proposals to Congress, might incline towards a review much less searching than the U.K. would wish. Sir Frank Lee wondered whether a fundamental divergence was not developing between the U.K. and the U.S. view concerning what should be a really long term Agreement. He hoped that Mr. Isbister could tell the Committee something about what the U.S. officials had said about all this.

Mr. Isbister saw no reason why October 5 would not be a satisfactory date for the opening of the Commonwealth talks and said that it should be possible to meet the U.K. view about representation. Referring to the timing of the Review Session of G.A.T.T., however, he said that Canadian officials were now considering the desirability of some temporary postponement, until a date early in 1955. Canadian views had been deliberately formulated in a very tentative way until it could be discovered whether the U.K. regarded the Review Session in November 1954 as an integral part of its progress towards convertibility. It would be recalled that the prospect of the three-year Trade Agreements Act had given some urgency to the decision to review G.A.T.T. in the autumn of 1954. Now that the Kean Bill had been postponed we were still waiting to see what the position of the U.S. would be on commercial policy. The Randall Report had recommended that the organizational side of G.A.T.T. should be renegotiated and submitted to Congress which was one reason why the U.S. wanted an early review session. Canadian officials were wondering, however, whether it would be wise to proceed with the review in November in the absence of any positive indication of what sort of commercial policy might receive the approval of Congress. There were some risks in going into the session at a time when the U.S. would have nothing new or positive to offer in exchange for what it might wish to withdraw. Mr. Isbister pointed out that as the schedules were only bound until June 1955, something would have to be done before then. If any delay was desirable it should not be a long delay.

Sir Frank Lee said that while the U.K. might consider a postponement of the review session, it would not wish to alter the date of the preparatory Commonwealth talks.

Sir Leslie Rowan observed that the Canadian views on timing were based upon an assessment of the net negotiating position of the U.S. He wondered whether this position would be any stronger by March 1955.

Mr. Isbister replied that it was already fairly clear what the position of the U.S. Administration would be in November. Although no one could say what their position would be in March, there was, at any rate, the possibility that it might be better.

He went on to say that feelings of urgency in the U.S. about the review session were mainly concerned not with the substance of G.A.T.T., but with the constitutional question of putting the administrative provisions to Congress. Some U.S. officials were not sure that the administrative provisions could be separated from the substantive provisions. If so, this would mean that the review would have to be done in one piece. It appeared that opinion in Washington on the timing of the review session might still be a little fluid.

Sir Frank Lee agreed that there might be some difficulties in the idea of trying to separate the administrative from the other provisions in G.A.T.T.

Mr. Plumptre pointed out that one main reason why Canadian officials had come to favour postponement was that the U.S. had said clearly that they did not want to review the whole of G.A.T.T., starting in November. This would mean attempting to deal with it in two parts which was undesirable.

Mr. Cohen wondered whether the U.S. could not have its aims decided by January. There was a danger that if the review was postponed momentum would be lost. Moreover, the review would have to deal with changes needed for the collective approach. It might not be desirable to delay consideration of these changes too long.

Mr. Isbister said that it was not known yet what sort of tariff negotiations would have to take place before June 1955. Some countries might want certain items renegotiated. The U.S. is evidently hoping to be in a position to negotiate with Japan and to make tariff concessions to countries which are willing to negotiate with Japan. If the process was well under way before June it ought to be easy to get the schedules rebound until the conclusion of the negotiations. Because the U.S. may not be in any different position on commercial policy by January than it is now, any postponement should probably be until about March, 1955, if there is to be postponement of the review session.

Mr. Isbister added that it was realized that the consideration of the trade rules in G.A.T.T. had been related by the U.K. to the transitional rules of trade for a convertibility operation. He asked what kind of organizational forum the U.K. would want for the discussion of the transitional trade rules.

Sir Leslie Rowan replied that the U.K. had contemplated the I.M.F.-G.A.T.T. Advisory Group, not for the purpose of drawing up rules, but as an organization in which to discuss broad developments and possible remedies. It might also discuss the application of rules, but whether it should was less certain. Some of the European countries at the recent meeting had suggested an extended O.E.E.C. for this purpose, but this raised the difficulty of appropriate representation for non-member countries. If an I.M.F.-G.A.T.T. body was given appropriate powers by its parent organizations, there should be no conflict of jurisdiction. In the transitional period countries would be moving towards broader trade rules, and at the same time would be keeping the code of liberalization in being and gradually bringing their other liberalization up to that level. This could be supervised partly by G.A.T.T. and partly by O.E.E.C.

Sir Frank Lee agreed that the G.A.T.T. review would be the appropriate time to have the trade rules that would be required in the conditions of the collective approach worked out, but he was not certain that this was an argument for an early date for the review. It might even be an argument for making it later.

Mr. Rasminsky pointed out that until recently the U.K. had wanted to have some experience of convertibility before adopting long term trade rules. It now appeared, however, that they could be worked out in the review session if this began in November. If, however, it was postponed until March he asked whether the long-term rules should be worked out in some other forum in order to avoid any postponement of the whole operation.

Sir Leslie Rowan agreed that the U.K. now thought it possible and desirable to work out long term trade rules in advance. It was possible that Ministers might look to the G.A.T.T. review for an indication of U.S. policies. If so, a postponement of the review would delay that opportunity of judging the U.S. position unless some other developments in the meantime gave an indication of U.S. intentions which he thought on the whole was unlikely.

Sir Frank Lee said that there was a real dilemma here. We ought to work out both "possible" and "desirable" proposals. On the one hand there was the need to keep up the momentum, and on the other the difficulty that could arise if the G.A.T.T. review were started at the time when the U.S. position was insufficiently clear. If a "State of the Union" message had been issued, it might be that the latter part of January would be the best time for the review session.

Mr. Rasminsky added that while the U.S. attitude on such things as the balance of payments escape clause was a strong one, their difficulty was that they could exert less influence if they had no tariff concessions to offer.

Mr. Cohen suggested that the question of reviewing G.A.T.T. itself might almost be easier and lead to better results if there was no tariff bargaining, particularly with Japan. It should not be assumed that the Long Term Rules for Trade would differ radically from the existing Rules. There would have to be some modifications of G.A.T.T. and arrangements for the termination of certain transitional provisions. He suggested that this was an argument for having a fairly early review of the G.A.T.T.

Sir Frank Lee summed up by saying that there appeared to be no great difference of view between the two sides on this question. It was clear that a number of considerations would have to be balanced, and it would be advisable to feel our way in Washington where the situation might become clearer in a month or so.

Mr. Isbister agreed generally, and stressed the fact that one thing the Canadian officials were afraid of was a set of negotiations which might lead to a new instrument which would go to Governments ad referendum during a period in which the present G.A.T.T. might become ineffective.

Sir Leslie Rowan concluding the discussion on the subject said that he wished to stress again that, from the U.K. point of view, there was no "timetable" for Convertibility.

Messrs. Cohen and Sanders left the meeting.

REVIEW OF THE GATT AND TARIFF NEGOTIATIONS WITH JAPAN

Thibodeaux of the U.S. Embassy came to see us on July 2 on instructions from the State Department about the two above referenced matters.

Review of the GATT — Thibodeaux reiterated the U.S. desire that the Review should be held this fall. He pointed out that since the discussions on this subject in Ottawa on May 26 and 27 the United States Administration had pressed forward with the one-year extension of the Trade Agreements Act without strings and it would likely soon be law. The climate at the Review Session therefore should not be such as to make impossible a reasonably successful Review.

We indicated that in the light of the fact that countries contemplating convertibility wished to reach agreement this fall on the long term trading rules (which was apparent from the document which the United Kingdom had submitted to OEEC and from our recent discussions at the Canada-U.K. Continuing Committee), and in view of the progress in obtaining a one-year extension of the Trade Agreements Act with a green light for tariff negotiations with Japan, we would probably be prepared to agree that the Review should be gone ahead with this fall. However that was not to say that some of the difficulties in holding the Review in the absence of firmer indications of what United States trade policy might be in the near future would now be absent. It was still not clear how the countries which were not contemplating convertibility for themselves in the near future could be convinced that there was something for them in a revision of the GATT at this stage. The success of the negotiations would depend in large part on careful preparation and presentation by the United States. Thibodeaux did not dissent from this observation and I think that our conversations on May 26 and 27 have impressed on the State Department that the United States will have to present its proposals in a very careful manner and might be well advised not to force those issues on which their bargaining position is particularly weak.

Tariff Negotiations with Japan

The United States want the Intersessional Committee to schedule multilateral tariff negotiations for the purpose of Japan's full accession to GATT. Such negotiations would commence about February 1, 1955 and would have to be concluded of course at least thirty days before the expiration of the one-year renewal of the U.S. Trade Agreements Act. Thibodeaux indicated that present tentative thinking in the United States contemplates these negotiations including (a) bilateral negotiations between Contracting Parties and Japan, and (b) additional negotiations among the Contracting Parties on those items in which Japan was not the principal supplier but had an interest and was anxious to obtain some concession.

The usual domestic trade agreement procedures in the United States will be observed. The proposed list of commodities should be published by September 1, 1954.

We said that, as had been pointed out at the May 26 and 27 discussions, there appeared to be little scope for bilateral negotiations between Canada and Japan. However, if the Japanese wished to submit to us informally a list of proposed items for direct negotiation with Canada we would be glad to examine it. If we did enter into these GATT negotiations it seemed that the useful opportunities (if any) for us would more likely arise in negotiations with third countries, in particular the United States. We were not ruling out the possibility of Canada entering into the negotiations for Japan's accession — participation of course would require a government decision — and we pointed out that we were already on record as being prepared to look for a suitable basis for Japan's accession to the General Agreement.

MEETING OF GATT INTERSESSIONAL COMMITTEE

For Mr. Wilgress.

Our representatives to the meeting commencing on July 26th will be Reisman and Barrow. We have had indepartmental consideration of the agenda for the meeting and the following outlines our views on the more important questions which will arise:

1. Review of the Agreement. As you know we think the Review should now go forward this fall. The proposal in Document IC/W/26 that the Ninth Session should commence on October 28th and that the Review should be discussed in plenary meetings commencing on November 8 appears satisfactory to us. However, we would be prepared to discuss alternative dates if a majority of the Contracting Parties had other dates to propose.

2. Agenda for the Ninth Session. The draft Agenda circulated under IC/W/25 appears adequate to us but we may wish to discuss with other delegations the inclusion of the recent French Compensation Tax on imports. We also note that the tax de transmission which was discussed at the Eighth Session, and which the French have since increased, has not been included.

3. Accession of Japan. Our record with respect to Japan's application to negotiate with a view to accession has shown our sympathetic attitude and we will be prepared to support efforts to make arrangements for tariff negotiations early next year directed to Japan's accession. The question of our participation in such negotiations if they are held has not yet been submitted to Cabinet but we are prepared to indicate at the Intersessional Committee that officials would be willing to recommend to the Government that Canada join in any such negotiations if satisfactory arrangements for general negotiations can be made. For your own information, preliminary studies by Finance and Trade and Commerce on the possible scope for negotiations indicate that there is limited scope for direct negotiation with Japan but possibly more latitude with respect to negotiations with the United States on items of interest to Japan.

4. Article XVIII. As indicated in our discussions at the Commonwealth Economic Conference, we recognise that there is a case for differentiating between "under-developed" countries (if they can be defined) and the more developed countries for the purpose of determining rights and obligations with respect to quantitative restrictions. The same reasoning would seem to apply to tariffs insofar as they are a substitute for q.r.'s. We appreciate that this differentiation is necessary in order to avoid watering down the commitments of the more developed countries. With respect to the proposal set forth by Wyndham White, officials in Ottawa feel that it does not contain adequate safeguards against abuse for protectionist purposes. We would not be able at the Intersessional meeting to take a firm position on a definitive draft. However we will be prepared to indicate a willingness to consider proposals for dealing with the special problems of under-developed countries and to participate in informal discussions at the time of the Intersessional Committee to this end. In this connection we attach great importance to the problem of defining the category of under-developed countries in order to limit its application.

5. Substantive Questions arising at the Review Session. To the extent that the views expressed in our telegram to you No. 470 of July 15⁶¹ are relevant to any formal or informal discussions during the Intersessional meeting, they will serve as guidance for our representatives in any such discussions.

Geneva, July 27, 1954

CONFIDENTIAL. IMPORTANT.

Following from Canadian delegation to GATT, Intersessional Meeting.

1. At the first meeting of the Intersessional Committee, United States, New Zealand and Cuba gave notice that they would seek authority to re-negotiate certain bounded items under the "exceptional circumstances" provisions relating to Article 28. If the Committee's consent is obtained these countries will enter into negotiations with substantially interested contracting parties before the Ninth Session.

2. Items involved are:

(a) United States tariff paragraph 15 30(e) — boots, shoes the uppers of which are composed wholly or in chief value of wool, cotton, etc., with sole composed wholly or in chief value of leather — 20 percent. A bill has been passed by Congress which affects the binding of this item. Congress has given the Administration 180 days from July 8th within which to renegotiate. This item was negotiated with Czechoslovakia. Under provisions of HR 6465 if wearing surfaces of outer sole consists of rubber or a rubber substitute then sole will be deemed to be wholly or in chief value of rubber. This will prevent classification of such footwear at a lower rate of duty by inserting a piece of leather between sole and upper and thus making sole in chief value of leather.

(b) New Zealand tariff items 195 — children's boots and shoes and 196(2) — slippers, NEI. The most favoured nation rates are bounded to Czechoslovakia. There is no, repeat no, British preferential rate on children's boots and shoes. In the case of slippers a preferential rate of 30 percent is bounded to Canada under GATT. Preferential rates of 25 percent and 35 percent are bounded to United Kingdom and Australia respectively.

(c) Cuba part 2 (ii) schedule 9 tariff item 36 (b) — wrought iron or steel rolled: in bars of all shapes including rods, rims, hoops. Binding to United States. The most favoured nation rate is not, repeat not, bounded. In view of this, Canada has no, repeat no, legal grounds on which to object to an increase of most favoured nation rates. The preferential rate is extended only to the United States.

3. Please inform us of Canadian interest in these items. No doubt you will notify us to be guided in considering these requests by the general instructions which were forwarded to the Canadian representative in connection with the Indian request under Article 28. When further details are made available concerning these requests we shall forward any relevant information to you.

4. The draft agenda for the Ninth Session was reviewed and adopted with certain additions. At the request of Italy an item pertaining to France's new compensation charge was placed on the agenda. It was agreed to have an informal exchange of views concerning the review session on both procedural and substantive problems. A similar meeting will be held to assess, informally and unofficially, the views regarding status of schedules after June 30th, 1955. The purpose of these informal exchanges is to give some indication to the governments of what issues are likely to arise with respect to both review and tariff schedules in order to facilitate their preparatory work over the next few months.

5. The Intersessional Meeting is being taken most seriously and a number of the more important trading countries have sent large and high level delegations. It is expected that meetings will carry through until at least the early part of next week.⁶²

MEETING OF COMMONWEALTH FINANCE MINISTERS, WASHINGTON, 1954

We have received from Denis Rickett, Economic Minister in the British Embassy here, an invitation for Canadian officials to attend a Commonwealth meeting at 11:30 a.m. on Wednesday, the 22nd of September, in the British Embassy. The purpose of the meeting would be to discuss the three papers which, we understand, you have already received from Whitehall — one on the GATT review, another on the junctions of the International Monetary Fund and the GATT, respectively, after a decisive move towards full convertibility has taken place, and a third on Articles VIII and XIV of the Fund Articles of Agreement. In addition, the United Kingdom representatives would like to discuss still a fourth paper which you have not yet received and which will be described below. We can appreciate that the date suggested for the meeting may not be very convenient from the Canadian point of view since, under present arrangements, some of our key officials would not have arrived by that time. Rickett, however, explained that Sir Leslie Rowan and the other officials coming from London were anxious, if at all possible, that the meeting should be held on Wednesday morning, since that afternoon the British enter discussions with United States authorities, which will continue until the opening of the Bank and Fund meetings; and they would like to know beforehand the reactions of the Commonwealth countries to their papers.

2. The fourth paper which United Kingdom officials would like to discuss deals with international organizations. Unfortunately, it will not be ready for circulation until immediately before the proposed meeting of officials. We learned from Rickett yesterday that it contains a new United Kingdom organizational proposal and, after considerable prodding, we managed to obtain from him some of its details. We gather that it calls for establishment by the Fund of a Council of Governors which would have functions not very different from those proposed for the Joint GATT-IMF Committee. The new council would be charged with keeping world trade and payments problems under review. In particular, the council would be responsible for considering the problems arising under Article VII of the Fund Articles of Agreement, insofar as this article might be used, as the United Kingdom has proposed, to deal with a "general scarcity" of any currency rather than with a "technical scarcity" in the Fund. The Council of Governors would also be asked to keep watch over the operation of the escape-clauses in the Fund Articles of Agreement, and in GATT, to see that they were not militating seriously against achievement of the agreed objectives.

3. Under the new United Kingdom plan, the Council of Governors would have perhaps ten members, some of whom might be permanent and others selected on a rotational basis. The managing Director of the Fund would also be a member ex officio and GATT would be represented as well. It is also hoped that the contracting parties to GATT might agree to supply the council with trade information and other assistance.

4. The proposed council would meet three or four times a year and more often, if necessary. Normally, the Governors would be represented by alternates, who should be senior officials in their own capitals. They should be seconded, in the view of United Kingdom authorities, by senior trade officials. If this plan were accepted, the United Kingdom, for example, would expect normally to be represented at the meetings by Sir Leslie Rowan and Sir Frank Lee.

5. As you will see, this proposal goes a long way towards meeting the view of the United States Treasury that responsibility for supervising the new regime of international trade and payments should be vested in the Fund. One of its features, however, may lead to United States opposition. Under the United Kingdom proposal it is not contemplated that the system of weighted voting would be carried over into the new Council of Governors, where it is hoped that unanimous decisions might be reached without a vote. Decisions reached by the Council of Governors would be binding on the Fund, provided they were taken within the Council's field of competence. They would not, of course, be binding of the contracting parties to GATT; but the United Kingdom authorities would hope that recommendations by the new body would carry great weight in that forum, particularly if senior trade officials has assisted in their formulation.

6. You may of course have heard of this proposal from Lee. But, if not, this preliminary information may put you in a position to offer some comment when it is presented to you next week.

7. We should be grateful to learn as quickly as possible what reply we should give to the invitation transmitted through the British Embassy. In the light of the timing of the proposed meeting, which it seems virtually impossible to change, we should also like to know who the Canadian representatives are likely to be.

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Reference: Your telegram EX-1695 of September 17.†

MEETING OF COMMONWEALTH OFFICIALS, WASHINGTON, 1954

The meeting of Commonwealth officials yesterday morning, as we expected, turned out to be short, ragged and tentative.

2. Discussion was focussed by Sir Leslie Rowan on the United Kingdom paper concerning the respective roles of the Fund and the GATT in supervising restrictions. There was no discussion of the paper on the GATT review; and the other two papers on Articles VIII and XIV of the Fund agreement and on international organization were considered only very briefly. Our immediately following telegram† contains the text of the new United Kingdom paper on international organizations that was circulated at the meeting.

3. After Rowan had made a brief exposition of the United Kingdom's idea of how responsibility should be divided between the Fund and the GATT for supervising import restrictions imposed for balance of payments reasons and had explained the United Kingdom proposals concerning weighted voting in the Fund, Rasminsky offered some informal comments. He acknowledged that the United Kingdom's revised proposals marked some progress in accommodating divergent viewpoints. Following Rowan's example, but making it explicit, he set aside for the time being the question of prior approval of import restrictions; and after outlining the division of responsibility contemplated in the United Kingdom paper in order to make sure that there was no misunderstanding, he obtained from Rowan one clarification of some importance. It was confirmed that if the Fund made a determination that the totality of the import restrictions imposed by a country in balance of payments difficulties were not justified and if, nevertheless, the country in question still persisted in the error of its ways, it would then be for the GATT to take formal action. When this step had been taken, the offending country would be in default of its obligations under GATT rather than in default of its obligations under the Fund articles of agreement. The reason for this proposed procedure, Rowan confirmed, was to protect the eligibility of the defaulting country to use the Fund's resources.

4. Then turning to the question of weighted voting in the Fund, Rasminsky said that he sympathized with much of the reasoning that underlay the United Kingdom's proposals. The less use that was made in the Fund of the system of weighted voting, the more effective the organization would probably be. Indeed, it could be argued that it had been a mistake to adopt the system of weighted voting at Bretton Woods. But the fact remained that these provisions had been written into the articles of agreement and had been widely stressed when Congress was asked to ratify the agreement. While the United States administration might give a general indication that it would seek to avoid using its weighted voting power to impose its views on a large and respectable minority, it could not give any formal undertaking to forego the exercise of this prerogative without either seeking congressional approval of the amendment to the articles of agreement or at least obtaining the consent of congressional leaders. Either form of approval would be almost impossible to obtain; and, in any case, the administration could hardly be expected to seek it at a time when the Fund was being asked to extend a large stand-by credit (the bulk of which would no doubt be drawn in United States dollars) to support the convertibility of sterling.

5. Representatives of the under-developed countries showed considerable nervousness about vesting larger powers in the Fund than it enjoys at present. Prasad of India seemed to think that some quid pro quo should be received for what he regarded as the concession to United States opinion involved in widening the Fund's authority over import restrictions. In addition to the weighted voting in the Fund, there was also, he said the difficulty created by its "weighted staff". Judgments by the Fund, in his opinion, had been sometimes too lenient and sometimes too severe. He also was apprehensive over the possibility that, under the United Kingdom's proposals, the Fund would be given larger authority to supervise quantitative restrictions imposed to conserve exchange resources needed for economic development. This worry was also shared by the representative of Southern Rhodesia. Rowan and Rasminsky seemed to be successful in lulling these latter fears and in convincing representatives of the under-developed countries that supervision of the quantitative restrictions to be permitted to under-developed countries would remain the responsibility of GATT, where each of the contracting parties had an equal voice. Rowan noted, however, that the United Kingdom proposals probably needed to be clarified a little in order to put this point beyond doubt.

6. In advance of the meeting we had learned that the Australians had submitted a very stiff memorandum commenting on the United Kingdom's papers. This report was borne out by what Dr. Roland Wilson, the Australian Secretary of Finance, had to say yesterday morning. Without descending to details he said that the direction taken in the papers was very distasteful to Australia. The balance of payments was the most significant economic fact in Australia and Australian ministers were determined that ultimate control over Australia's external balance should remain in their own hands. For this reason they were reluctant to give any international body firm authority over import restrictions. There had been a revival of uneasiness within the Australian Government about the present provisions of the general agreement; and he was afraid that other contracting parties would find that the Australian representatives would take a difficult and critical line in the course of the GATT review. Even greater apprehensions were felt in Australia about the Fund, which was dominated excessively by United States influence. Australia would therefore consider it a retrograde step to entrust the Fund with increased authority over import restrictions, since this might be expected to leave Australian ministers with less latitude to impose quotas than they had at present. One of the troubles was that, although special provision was contemplated for under-developed countries and although the rules and procedures that had been proposed might be satisfactory to highly developed countries, too little attention had been devoted to the problems of a country like Australia, which could be called neither developed nor under-developed. The existing charters (i.e. the Fund articles of agreement and the GATT) were by no means entirely satisfactory from Australia's point of view. But he thought they might continue to be regarded as reasonably tolerable by Australian opinion. It would therefore be preferable to operate within them rather than to attempt any radical revision of their rules or of the relationship between them, since such an attempt would inevitably revive in an acute form all the old doubts and fears that were latent in Australia.

7. Discussion of the paper of Article VIII and Article XIV was sharply curtailed by the shortness of the time available. Wilson said that he thought the Australian Government would have a slightly more open mind on this question than on the proposal to increase the authority of the Fund; and he conceded that it would be difficult for other sterling area countries to oppose a move from Article XIV to Article VIII if the United Kingdom decided to take it. It was obvious however, that the whole question needed more extended discussion. Kamat of India noted that, if the transitional period were to be brought to an end, the question of timing would be very important. Agreeing, Rasminsky said that the decision on the timing of a move from Article XIV to Article VIII was one which the United Kingdom herself would have to take and that some of the considerations which the United Kingdom would no doubt have in mind were

(a) that the Fund might expect currencies which had been strengthened by the extension of stand-by credits and which had in fact become convertible to come under Article VIII; and

(b) that international confidence in sterling might be weakened if, after current non-resident sterling had been made convertible, the United Kingdom still insisted on retaining the protection afforded by Article XIV.

He also made a blanket reservation regarding the proposal that, even after the transitional period had come to an end, the United Kingdom should be permitted to discriminate in favour of the sterling area in any exchange restrictions that it might have to impose. The proposal to eliminate the necessity of prior approval under Article VIII would also, of course, require further examination.

8. The attacks made by the Australian and Indian representatives on the Fund seemed so extreme and untimely that Rasminsky at length felt obliged to speak up in its defence. No doubt the operations of the Fund, he said, had been less satisfactory and successful than had been hoped. But one important reason for the Fund's shortcomings had been that it had been designed for a world into which many of its members — in some cases for reasons beyond their control — had been unable to enter. That situation had set up inevitable stresses within the organization. But it might be hoped that, once major currencies became convertible, the Fund could pursue its objectives with a greater chance of success. In any case, an obligation had rested on members of the Fund's staff to see that the principles embodied in the articles of agreement were not slighted. After the meeting Rowan commented to us privately that he had been disturbed by the attacks made on the Fund's operations and was grateful that a few sentences had been said in its defence.

9. It was agreed that a further meeting should be held if possible within the next few days. Subsequently, a meeting was arranged for this afternoon; but it has had to be cancelled and it is not yet known when it will be possible to continue yesterday morning's discussions.

THE NINTH SESSION OF THE CONTRACTING PARTIES TO GATT;
INSTRUCTIONS TO THE CANADIAN DELEGATION⁶³

1. General Approach

The Contracting Parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade will review the Agreement at their Ninth Session which commences at Geneva on October 28. A preparatory meeting of delegates from Commonwealth countries is due to start in London on October 5.

During the seven years of its existence, tariffs have been reduced under this Agreement, world trade has been facilitated by it in many ways, and governments have been influenced to pursue more liberal commercial policies than would otherwise have been the case. The Canadian delegation should participate in the review of GATT and should attempt to strengthen the agreement, limit deviation from its basic principles and thereby support the promotion of trade.

2. The Organizational Provisions

⁶³ Le présent document et le document suivant ont été approuvés par le Cabinet le 30 septembre 1954. La délégation était dirigée par C.D. Howe, en sa qualité de ministre responsable et par Dana Wilgress, en qualité de président. Les autres principaux membres étaient A.F.W. Plumptre, L.E. Couillard, B.G. Barrow, A. Annis et M. Schwarzmenn.

This and the following document were approved by Cabinet on September 30, 1954. The delegation was led by C.D. Howe as the "minister in charge" and Dana Wilgress as chairman. It also included A.F.W. Plumptre, L.E. Couillard, B.G. Barrow, A. Annis and M. Schwarzmenn.

The United States Government has already outlined its provisional ideas as to the largely formal changes it may wish to seek in the organizational provisions of the GATT. These suggestions are designed to enable them to get Congressional approval for their participation in the GATT. While Canadian support of these proposals can only be tentative at this stage, it would seem to be in our general interest that the Canadian Delegation should sympathetically and constructively examine United States proposals on this subject, provided these do not involve material weakening of the Agreement nor a dilution of its essential objectives.

3. Provisions Applicable to Countries in Balance of Payments Difficulties

The GATT contains a general prohibition of quantitative restrictions but goes on to recognize the right of countries in balance of payments difficulties to impose such restrictions and to recognize certain circumstances in which the restrictions may be discriminatory in form. The United Kingdom now proposes a general tightening and redefinition of these balance of payments escape clauses to take effect after an agreed interval, perhaps a year, following a major move towards convertibility. If the major currencies are made convertible in the near future, it would not be unreasonable to provide for a transitional period of a year for countries to bring their policies into accordance with the new trade rules. It is to our advantage to seek to confine the use of quantitative restrictions which have limited our trade and the benefits of past tariff concessions in many countries overseas. It will undoubtedly be necessary to continue to recognize that countries in balance of payments difficulties may have recourse to quantitative restrictions, but the Delegation should insist that they be non-discriminatory in character, and should seek more satisfactory agreements with regard to the circumstances in which they may be imposed, the length of time for which they may remain in existence and the role of the Contracting Parties and the International Monetary Fund in effectively supervising them.

4. Discriminatory Restrictions Against a Persistent Creditor

The United Kingdom apparently will propose that discriminatory import restrictions may be applied only in one instance of importance, namely where a country's currency is recognized by the International Monetary Fund as being scarce because of the country's persistent creditor position. When the major move to convertibility that is now contemplated has been made, there will no longer be any economic justification for discrimination. However, the GATT and Fund Agreements now contain a scarce currency provision and there is little likelihood of its deletion. While, therefore, the Canadian Delegation could raise questions as to the desirability of a persistent creditor clause, its main efforts should be to seek reasonable safeguards to limit the use and application of any such clause. In particular, it should make sure that any right to discriminate should be restricted to the trade of a country which is a persistent creditor and whose currency has been declared scarce.

5. Transitional Period

It will be proposed that a transitional period be provided following the convertibility operation to permit countries to adjust their existing import restrictions to the new rules. The Canadian Delegation should attempt to make this transitional period as short as practicable.

6. Use of Quantitative Import Restrictions for Protective Purposes

Since many of the quantitative restrictions which have been imposed for financial reasons have also come to serve a protectionist purpose in the countries concerned, some countries may wish to retain certain of their quantitative restrictions even though there is no longer a balance of payments justification for them. It may be proposed that a further period of time be permitted, extending the transitional period, in cases in which there is a protectionist core of quantitative restrictions in existence. The General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade does not permit the imposition of quantitative restrictions for protectionist purposes, and the Canadian Delegation should not accept any proposals that countries with quantitative restrictions now in existence would have the right to continue them explicitly for such purposes. If it is unavoidable that some recognition be given to this problem, then the Canadian Delegation might explore the possibility of a compromise which would avoid unilateral rights, which would limit such measures to a short period and minimize their discriminatory character, which would provide cover only for a small number of specified industries, accompanied by an agreed program for dismantling these restrictions under close scrutiny by the Contracting Parties.

7. Import Restrictions in Agriculture and Fisheries

Recognizing the special character of the problems in these fields, the GATT now contains carefully limited provisions for the imposition of import restrictions on agricultural and fisheries products. In any discussion of this problem, the initial position of the Canadian Delegation should be to avoid widening the scope which is now given for import restrictions in these fields. It is likely, however, that the United States will have proposals to make in this field which have not yet been put forward. The Canadian Delegation should critically examine any alternatives to the existing provisions of GATT, should attempt to ensure through whatever general rules are agreed upon that Canadian products will have access to the United States and other markets on a fair and equitable basis, and should seek instruction before agreeing to any proposals in this field.

8. Export Subsidies

The GATT does not at present contain any effective restrictions on the rights of countries to make use of export subsidies. Recognizing that it would be in our interest to control more effectively the use of export subsidies, the Canadian Delegation should attempt to ensure that export subsidies should not be such as to harm the normal trade of other Contracting Parties.

9. Customs Valuation

The Canadian Delegation should seek to avoid any weakening of the present provisions relating to customs valuation. To clarify a point which has proved troublesome, the Canadian Delegation should also seek the concurrence of the Contracting Parties that, in valuing goods, it is not necessary to exempt taxes which are not levied directly on goods.

10. Special Treatment for Under-Developed Countries

The GATT now makes provision for under-developed countries to resort to special protective measures to assist in their programmes of economic development. The problem of under-developed countries will again be raised at the GATT review, and proposals will be made to give these countries greater freedom of action on trade policy than they now have. While the Delegation should keep in mind the desire of the Government to safeguard the basic principles of the GATT, they should also give sympathetic consideration to the special position of under-developed countries. Moreover, they should recognize that it may be possible to obtain tighter trade rules for the major trading countries if reasonable proposals are accepted, giving somewhat greater freedom to under-developed countries.

C.D. HOWE

W.E. HARRIS

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 212-54

[Ottawa], September 24, 1954

TARIFF POLICY — BINDING OF TARIFF RATES BEYOND JUNE, 1955

1. At the Ninth Session of the Contracting Parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT), which begins in Geneva on October 28, one of the first items of business will be the "Status of the Tariff Schedules". The question will be: What action should be taken regarding all the many tariff rates which, as a result of negotiations at Geneva (1947), Annecy (1949) and Torquay (1950), and the temporary prolongation of last year, are "bound" until — but only until — June 30, 1955?

2. If these rates became "unbound", they would not automatically go back to where they were before the negotiations; on the contrary, they would remain at their present reduced levels. But after June 30, 1955, countries would have certain rights, under the GATT, to raise tariffs — unilateral rights which they have agreed to forego until that time. The procedure that is laid down in the Agreement for exercising these rights is described below:

3. The bound tariff schedules, together with the "fair trading" provisions of the Agreement itself which protect them from impairment and from circumvention, embody the commercial policy of the Canadian Government: the policy of reducing barriers and broadening trade on a multilateral and non-discriminatory basis. In addition to the general economic reasons which have in past years led Canada to advocate and to practise this policy, there are special reasons at present:

The United Kingdom, in leading the "collective approach to freer trade and payments", has removed a large number of quantitative restrictions, including many such restrictions that discriminate against dollar imports, and is urging complete abolition of all such restrictions subject only to rigorous "escape clauses";

Most of the leading Continental countries show signs of following the lead of the United Kingdom;

The United States, which since the war made great strides toward liberalized trade policies, has faltered slightly under the present Administration, and the forces for and against further progress are somewhat precariously balanced.

Under such circumstances as these it would seem particularly desirable for Canada to continue its established policies. Accordingly, our Delegation to Geneva should seek a re-binding of tariff schedules on the broadest base acceptable to the Contracting Parties, and, if possible (as in former occasions), for a three-year period.

4. It is clear, particularly from preliminary GATT discussions last month, that there is no likelihood that the Contracting Parties, or even a majority of them, would agree to complete unqualified re-binding of all the present schedules. Many countries have serious difficulties with particular tariff rates, and some countries, by now accustomed to the protection of quantitative restrictions, may find it quite impossible to remove these restrictions without some upward adjustment of tariffs. Hence, the question is not whether there is to be some relief from the full rigor of tariff re-bindings, but what form such relief will take and how far it will go.

5. Most delegations at the discussions last month seemed to envisage a fairly general resort to their unilateral rights to raise tariffs. Under the agreed procedure, as embodied in the GATT, countries will be free to withdraw tariff concessions after June, 1955; they may offer what they consider satisfactory concessions in return, and the countries directly affected may, if not satisfied, withdraw other concessions in their turn. It may readily be seen that, if a round of tariff "renegotiations" were held under this procedure, much of the fabric of tariff concessions, laboriously built up at Geneva, Annecy and Torquay, might be quickly torn down.

6. Such negotiations would be entirely different from previous GATT negotiations (Geneva, Annecy and Torquay). On those occasions, led by the United States which offered the biggest market, there was a general reduction of tariffs which far more than counterbalanced the few and minor tariff increases that occurred. However, the U.S. is now unable to offer any substantial leadership and will be unable to do so until the Congress gives new powers to the Administration. This year's one-year extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act does indeed provide sufficient powers for a round of negotiations with Japan, but the present intentions of the Administration seem to be to use those powers very sparingly. When the intentions of the United States, the United Kingdom and others regarding tariff negotiations with Japan have become clearer, a memorandum regarding those negotiations will be submitted to Cabinet. Thus, any general round of negotiations that took place during the coming winter or spring would inevitably lead to higher, and not lower, trade barriers.

7. Accordingly, it would seem desirable for the Canadian Delegation to seek to minimize the dangers in the present situation. One method of pursuing this objective might be as follows: As many countries as possible, and particularly the United States, the United Kingdom and others with major trading interests, should be persuaded not to exercise their rights to increase tariffs after June 30, 1955; instead, and in so far as relief from present bindings was absolutely necessary, such relief might be sought piecemeal, from time to time as required. For this purpose it would probably be sufficient to embody permanently in the GATT something along the lines of a special escape arrangement agreed upon a year ago when the tariff bindings were last extended. Under this arrangement, the country in need of relief has to establish, with the other members of GATT, a general case for special consideration before the process of renegotiation can begin; it thus carries no unilateral rights. This escape (together with the existing escape clause allowing relief for an industry suffering "serious injury") would provide a continuing element of flexibility to deal, if necessary, with exceptional cases after tariffs had been rebound for a further period beyond June, 1955.

8. In conclusion, it is recommended that the Canadian Delegation should:

(a) seek to achieve a general re-binding of tariff schedules for a further three years on the broadest base acceptable to the Contracting Parties;

(b) seek to avoid any general tearing down of the existing structure of tariff concessions, such as might be involved in a general round of tariff negotiations; and,

(c) seek further instructions before accepting any positions materially at variance with (a) or (b).

DESPATCH 1697

SECRET

Reference: Our telegram No. WA-1671 of the 23rd of September, 1954.

MEETING OF COMMONWEALTH OFFICIALS, WASHINGTON, 1954

The discussion of the United Kingdom papers continued its rather sluggish and theoretical course at a second meeting on Friday afternoon. India, Pakistan, and Ceylon were unrepresented; and the New Zealand and South African representatives, for the most part, were without instructions. As a result, the meeting was profitable only for the additional light it threw on Australian attitudes, for some clarification of the United Kingdom's intentions, and for the opportunity it provided of making some Canadian comments.

2. The meeting was opened by Sir Leslie Rowan asking representatives of sterling area countries to express any opinions they might have formed on the United Kingdom proposal that it should move from Article XIV to Article VIII of the Fund Articles of Agreement. Rowan directed attention particularly to the two questions raised in the covering memoranda:

(a) Would other sterling area countries see difficulty in acceptance by the United Kingdom of the obligations of Article VIII after non-resident current sterling had been made convertible?

(b) Would other sterling area countries be themselves disposed to assume the obligations of Article VIII?

3. The representative of South Africa said that his country was in favour of assuming the obligations of Article VIII and would be prepared to move from Article XIV as soon as non-resident current sterling was made convertible. Dr. Roland Wilson, the Australian Secretary of Finance, then made some remarks which showed how much backsliding there has been in Canberra. Addressing himself to the first of the two questions put by Rowan, he expressed concern over the position of some Australian industries in the event that the United Kingdom assumed the obligations of Article VIII. After such a move the United Kingdom would not be able, under the GATT rules, to take advantage of Article XIV of the Fund Agreement to discriminate in favour of imports from Australia. This would certainly cause injury to Australia's trade with the United Kingdom in some comparatively minor, but politically critical, commodities. Production of dried and processed fruits, for example, in Australia had been encouraged by the discriminatory quantitative restrictions that had been operated by the United Kingdom. There was no doubt that much of this production was not competitive. In time its competitive position would improve. But if the United Kingdom were obliged to discontinue its discriminatory import restrictions in such fields, he was afraid that the damage that would be caused in Australia would be considerable and that the consequent political clamour would be very hard to manage. The problem would be aggravated because of Australian worries about subsidized exports of United States agricultural commodities.

4. Perhaps by connivance with Rowan, the representative of Southern Rhodesia at that point remarked that his country would almost certainly face similar problems over its exports of tobacco to the United Kingdom; but, for his part, he thought that these problems would have to be faced as an inevitable consequence of the logic inherent in the Collective Approach. Rowan then added his support to that view and recalled that these issues had been thrashed out as long ago as the fall of 1952. On the second question raised by Rowan, Wilson said that if the United Kingdom moved from Article XIV to Article VIII, Australia would certainly be under some pressure to follow suit. Whether that would be desirable, it would hardly be for him to say since the consequences of Australia making its exchange restrictions non-discriminatory would not fall on Australia's own resources but would rather have the effect of putting some additional stress on the central dollar reserves of the sterling area.

5. The discussion then turned to an examination of the United Kingdom proposal that, if at some stage after sterling had been made convertible and had come under the provisions of Article VIII it became necessary to reimpose exchange restrictions, the United Kingdom should be permitted to discriminate in favour of sterling area countries. Mr. Rasminsky said that it seemed difficult to the Canadian authorities to see how such a new and far-reaching amendment of Article VIII could be urged on the United States and on the Fund generally at a time when the United Kingdom was hoping to secure a large stand-by credit that would be principally, of course, in United States dollars. Such a proposal would have to be based on one or other of two possible assumptions:

(a) It might be argued that the sterling area should be considered as a unitary monetary area. But such a thesis would have corollaries that would hardly be acceptable to all sterling area countries. In that case the sterling area should have a common quota in the Fund and should speak with one voice

(b) Alternatively, it might be argued that in all circumstances the payments problems of the United Kingdom and the sterling area would best be met if there were no exchange restrictions within the area. At the very least, that proposition did not strike the Canadian authorities as being self-evident.

There then followed some inconclusive sparring about the technical feasibility of operating exchange controls within the sterling area. Fighting down their sense of outrage as best they could, the United Kingdom officials argued that what was in question was a temporary balance of payments problem and that an emergency of short duration should not be allowed to disrupt the complicated banking and trading links that bind the sterling area together. They also explained that, if they were faced with such a situation, they would certainly not be prepared to impose exchange restrictions on transfers to other sterling area countries and, that being so, it hardly seemed honest not to seek an amendment of Article VIII. Shortly, however, Rowan recovered his equanimity and said that he could see the strength of the point that the game might not be worth the candle. It might be enough if in the course of discussions with United States authorities and with the Fund, the United Kingdom were to make its position clear rather than try to negotiate an amendment of Article VIII. Before discussion of this issue was concluded, Rasminsky had also introduced the idea that the same logic that could be used to justify exchange discrimination in favour of sterling area countries could be used to justify trade discrimination. This risk would not be absent from the minds of those who might be asked to agree to an amendment to Article VIII.

6. In general, Rasminsky suggested that just as the United Kingdom would expect the Fund to place some reliance on the good faith of the United Kingdom and not demand too precise guarantees about the dismantling of restrictions and the abolition of discrimination, so the United Kingdom should be prepared to have some confidence in the good faith of the Fund. It might well be that, if in a particular situation the United Kingdom had to reimpose exchange restrictions, it would not be sensible to erect them against sterling area countries. But the United Kingdom, he thought, would be well advised to trust the good sense of the Fund in such a contingency. In the same vein, he expressed some doubt about the wisdom of seeking an amendment to Article VIII to remove the necessity of prior approval for the imposition of exchange restrictions. His views, he said, were more open on this score. But he suggested that here again the better course might be to trust that the Fund would show good sense and despatch in dealing with any application made to it by the United Kingdom in an emergency.

7. Discussion of the United Kingdom paper on international organizations produced one useful clarification from Rowan. He said that, in his own mind at least, the function of the proposed Council of Governors would be to give advice to governments. Initially, at least, it should not be asked to take decisions that would be binding on the Fund. He hoped that it would gradually come to inspire such confidence that the Fund would invite it to assume greater authority. But it might well begin, he thought, as a body charged only with offering advice. Its recommendations might not always be precisely formulated. They might sometimes even be comparatively fragmentary. But it seemed to him that such a body would fill a useful purpose even if it only served to remove some areas of disagreement between the views of the financial and commercial advisers of the various governments that would be represented on it. Rasminsky commented that, with this clarification, he thought the proposal would be much more likely to command the support of the United States and Canadian authorities.

London, October 18, 1954

CONFIDENTIAL

COMMONWEALTH TALKS ON G.A.T.T.

The following summary if endorsed by Plumptre and Isbister may be useful for those who cannot read the full minutes.

2. This very full and useful exchange of information owed a great deal to the friendly and capable chairmanship of Sir Frank Lee, as well as to the high calibre of many of the principal delegates. Mr. Jha, for example, was a skilful spokesman for India, Mr. de Waal Meyer of South Africa was forthright and concise, and Mr. Crawford put the Australian case with a kind of stubborn eloquence. The urbane and tactful Mr. Melville of the Colonial Office, sandwiched between Mr. Gomes and Mr. Bustamants and assisted, if that is the word, by a host of Colonial advisers, spoke effectively on behalf of the diverse interests of the several colonies.

General Commercial Policy

3. The opening statements under this head set the tone for much of the subsequent discussion; it drew the lines between those who wanted stricter trade rules and those who thought the G.A.T.T. was already too rigid. Sir Frank Lee stressed the need for tight trade rules for the sake of the collective approach, and Mr. Plumptre followed with an assessment of the achievements of G.A.T.T. and a warning about the danger of giving way at this particular time to the protectionist pressures which were naturally being felt now that post-war shortages had disappeared.

4. Mr. Crawford however replied that the present GATT was incomplete, partial, and overly rigid. It was "incomplete" because so many of the provisions of the draft ITO Charter had been left out, and "partial" because too much designed to suit the interests of advanced industrial nations. Mr. Johnsen of New Zealand followed Mr. Crawford's line of criticism here, and throughout most of the meetings.

5. If Mr. Crawford thought GATT was a rigid instrument, Mr. de Waal Meyer criticised it for being too flexible. It had not yet led to sufficient progress towards free and multilateral trade. He said the South African Government had no sympathy for industries which looked for protection to cover inefficiency, and South Africa had never used quantitative restrictions for protective purposes. He added a plea that countries should liberalize their trade progressively prior to the date of convertibility.

6. The Asian spokesmen were all on the side of flexibility. Mr. Jayasuriya thought the United Kingdom attitude towards the review was too much concerned with the problems of the collective approach; Mr. Sukthanker and Mr. Taffazzal Ali reminded us how vulnerable was the sub-continent to the caprices of nature.

7. Mr. Melville endorsed the aims of the collective approach but reminded the meeting of the problems for colonial products that arose as the United Kingdom proceeded with trade liberalization.

Japan

8. It was clear that few if any Commonwealth countries other than Canada were prepared to endorse Japan's admission without qualification. There was full recognition however that the application of Article XXXV was most undesirable in the general context of Japan's relationship with the rest of the world and with individual Commonwealth countries.

9. The discussion was mainly centred on the United Kingdom proposal whereby Article XXXV would be amended so as to provide that the obligations of existing contracting parties towards a new member acceding to the GATT could be subject to a bilateral agreement between an existing member and the new member. Sir Frank Lee said the United States officials with whom this had been discussed had objected that it would weaken GATT if bilateral agreements were allowed to override GATT. These officials had suggested that it might be better to amend Article XXXV so as to allow members to apply its provisions to Japan at any time instead of at the time of Japan's accession. The United Kingdom delegates, however, thought the United States proposal unsuitable because the safeguard it would provide was wider than would be needed and would therefore be very difficult to use.

10. Australia, South Africa and New Zealand were thinking along the lines of the United Kingdom scheme, although Mr. Crawford thought there was just a chance that Australia might find a solution compatible with the existing GATT as Canada had done. The delegates from India and Pakistan sympathized with the United Kingdom's difficulties, but left open the question whether they would support the United Kingdom proposal.

11. Dr. Isbister expressed some misgivings about the desirability of GATT giving its blessing to bilateral agreements which would over-ride the GATT Articles without the contracting parties having an opportunity of seeing the terms of the bilateral agreements before concurring in an amendment to Article XXXV. Sir Frank Lee replied that it could be provided that such bilateral agreements would not affect the rights of other contracting parties, and added that the bilateral agreements would be registered with GATT. He said, however, and in this was followed by South Africa and Australia, that the United Kingdom could not put its bilateral agreements up for judgment by other contracting parties.

12. One of the main United Kingdom worries about Japan's admission is of course the effect of Japanese competition in third markets, especially Australia. When asked whether there was any thought that a bilateral agreement between the United Kingdom and Japan would contain any provisions designed to protect United Kingdom interests in third markets, Sir Frank Lee replied that an agreement between the United Kingdom and Japan would only relate to United Kingdom and Colonial markets; the United Kingdom hoped that the third countries by virtue of bilateral agreements of their own with Japan would effectively safeguard United Kingdom interests in those countries.

13. There was a little desultory discussion of the formula that had been devised by a GATT working party on the admission of Japan, but the United Kingdom and other countries thought its adoption was out of the question since it would put the action of an individual country up to the judgment of a majority of the contracting parties.

Quantitative Restrictions

(a) Permanent Trade Rules

14. Opposition to the United Kingdom proposals was led by India and Australia. Mr. Jha said they appeared to be designed mainly to prevent other countries from accumulating convertible sterling by restricting imports from the Sterling Area. He argued that non-discriminatory quantitative restrictions would not have this result; the danger really lay in the use of discriminatory restrictions. (Mr. France later pointed out how difficult it was in practice to determine whether or not quantitative restrictions were being applied in a discriminatory fashion). Mr. Jha looked upon QRs as only one among several means of controlling imports and saw no reason why they should be outlawed when tariffs were not. But he was willing to have GATT "control" a situation in which a country by using quotas persistently maintained an external surplus.

15. Mr. Crawford thought the United Kingdom proposals suited only the highly developed countries which wanted to further their exports of manufactures. The Australian economy was highly vulnerable to price change in a few main crops. He disliked the proposal that ex post facto approval should be required for QRs; no such approval was required for export subsidies. He also disliked the notion of a two-year limit on balance of payments QRs and the suggestion that if a balance was not restored within two years a waiver (requiring a two-thirds majority of contracting parties) would have to be sought. He thought the recent need to intensify the import restrictions Australia had imposed in 1952 and had gradually relaxed since then proved that a two-year limit would be unrealistic.

16. Mr. Plumptre reminded the meeting of the fundamental difference between QRs and tariffs, and Mr. Cohen pointed out that tariff negotiations had no meaning unless they were based on the premise that quotas were not permitted. Mr. Cohen said the United Kingdom regarded QRs as a "pernicious obstacle to international trade". But for all that, Mr. Crawford yielded no ground at all.

17. Mr. Crawford also criticized the role proposed for the IMF in this field, although Mr. Plumptre pointed out that this was already implicit in Article XV. Mr. Crawford thought the IMF was unduly dominated by the United States, and could not be convinced that its proposed task of "judging the facts" would be carried out without bias.

(b) The Transitional Period

18. Mr. France said that the length of the transitional period would depend on how much time elapsed before convertibility was achieved. The United Kingdom had proposed a transitional period of about a year, but it was possible that after this transitional year the elimination of a hard core of restrictions might require up to another year. Mr. Isbister suggested that it was important during the current period, i.e. before convertibility, that the sense of progress should be maintained. The longer the current period the less necessary it should be to have an extended transitional period. There appeared to him to be no need to provide for a hard core period unless convertibility was expected to come fairly soon. Sir Frank Lee agreed with this, and promised that the United Kingdom would continue to relax its restrictions as far as possible during the current period.

(c) Agriculture

19. In the light of the expressed inability of the Americans to yield any ground on the application of QRs to agricultural commodities subject to price support operations, Mr. Cohen put forward some personal suggestions that might be examined: retaliatory measures by affected countries; the acceptance and legalization of the United States position (by amending Article XI); or requiring a country maintaining such restrictions to negotiate for them in the same way as it would renegotiate a bound tariff. None of these suggestions appeared to the Canadian delegation to be very helpful. There was already provision in GATT for retaliatory action, and the other two suggestions would have the effect of legalizing the United States default. Nor was Mr. Crawford willing to legalize the United States stand. He pointed out that it was often impossible for an affected country such as Australia to find adequate compensation for the harm suffered. The loss of the United States market was only part of the problem; the same agricultural policies led to over-production which in turn led to dumping. Mr. Crawford was unwilling to yield any ground to the Americans on this point, and said that if the United States continued to use QRs to protect its agriculture and did not abandon dumping it was unreasonable to expect Australia to regard GATT as a satisfactory instrument. He was supported throughout by Mr. Johnsen. Mr. Jha suggested that it was up to the United States to make some compensatory offer; Commonwealth countries would lose their bargaining position if they took the initiative in looking for methods of improving the United States position.

20. Sir Frank Lee explained that it was not the United Kingdom intention to go to Geneva with a readymade proposal to legalize the United States stand or to try to make it easy for the United States to maintain its present attitude. But he thought that it was not too early to give preliminary thought to the possible outcome that might result if the United States could not be induced to change its position.

21. There seemed therefore to be general agreement with the Canadian view that it was essential to take a strong stand against the Americans on this issue and maintain it with some tenacity for as long as possible. No doubt everyone recognized that in the end the amount of ground the Americans might yield would probably be small, and that an unsatisfactory compromise was the only eventual outcome that could be expected.

(d) Under-developed Countries

22. It was clear that the under-developed countries wanted more freedom to use QRs for development than they now had in Article XVIII. Mr. Jayasuriya proposed that they should be allowed to impose quotas to protect nascent industries without prior approval, and that any contracting party materially affected should be free to open bilateral negotiations and, if necessary, to bring the matter before the contracting parties. Mr. Tafazzal Ali agreed that prior approval should not be required.

23. Mr. Jha said there should be a clear definition of under-developed countries and they alone should be given the right to use QRs for protective purposes. Ceylon and Pakistan took a similar view, but Mr. Johnsen and Mr. Bertram (Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland) did not want to see Article XVIII restricted in this fashion. Mr. de Waal Meyer was opposed to the use of Article XVIII at all, but thought if it must be used a time limit should put on the action taken under it.

24. Mr. Melville thought the terms of Article XVIII should be broadened to permit the United Kingdom to take exceptional measures in the United Kingdom market to assist Colonial development.

Subsidies

25. Sir Frank Lee pointed out that the United States had indicated that they would be prepared to see the provisions of GATT brought into line with Article XXVIII of the draft Havana Charter (the equitable share concept). Mr. Crawford, however, thought this inadequate. He thought that something along the lines of Article XXVI of the ITO Charter should also be brought in. He had little confidence in the ability of the United States Administration to carry out a reasonable policy with respect to agricultural surpluses. He said there must be a genuine collective approach which embraced everyone, and importing countries deriving immediate benefit from cheap United States supplies must play their part. He proposed that importing countries should be obliged to impose anti-dumping or countervailing duties equivalent to the amount of the export subsidies concerned.

26. The Australian suggestion got some support from South Africa, and India. Mr. France explained that it would raise difficult technical problems for the United Kingdom. Mr. Johnsen said that this was also true of New Zealand, and suggested that for that reason QRs might be a better answer to export subsidies. However, even Mr. Crawford thought this would be going too far. Dr. Isbister suggested that an attempt might be made to negotiate a positive prohibition of export subsidies. He thought the implications of the Australian suggestion would need a good deal of study.

Discrimination Against a Persistent Creditor

27. The brief discussion of this subject was somewhat inconclusive, but it was recognized on the United Kingdom side that "organizing" discrimination, if it ever became a practical issue, would be far from easy. It was agreed too that this question should be thought of in terms of discrimination against a persistent creditor as a country, not against a currency.

Bilateral Trade

28. Mr. Cohen asked for general support for the United Kingdom's objective of discouraging bilateral trade arrangements which would be likely to frustrate the approach to freer trade and payments, but he did not think it appropriate to seek any new provisions in GATT. Dr. Isbister agreed that it would not be possible to write into GATT provisions which would outlaw the kind of bilateral trading Mr. Cohen had in mind. He thought that to some extent Article I already covered this point. The Asian delegates, while supporting the principle that bilateral arrangements generally should be discouraged, indicated that in a number of cases they themselves would not be able to give them up entirely.

International Commodity Arrangements

29. The Australians argued that the vacancy left by the exclusion from GATT of the essence of Chapter VI of the ITO Charter must be filled at the review session. This was part of the "package" Australia expected to receive at that time. The approach now should be a little different however. In particular the prior requirement of a "burdensome surplus" before a commodity agreement can be made should not apply. If no agreement was to be reached on commodity policy provisions Australia would want Articles XX (i)(b) and XXIX(i) eliminated. The Australians disagreed with the United Kingdom suggestion that this should be left for a working party to deal with after the Review Session.

30. There was fairly general agreement with the aims of the Australian and United Kingdom proposals, although a number of differences of view on the methods to follow remained.

Preferences

31. Sir Frank Lee recalled the Ministerial discussion on this subject at the Commonwealth Economic Conference when the notion of a general release from Article

I was rejected.⁶⁴ Commonwealth Finance Ministers had generally reaffirmed this attitude in Washington this year, although Sir Arthur Fadden had reserved his position.

32. Mr. Crawford said Australia had regarded Article I as part of the package which would also have contained Article 15 of the ITO Charter. Now the value of preferences was being destroyed by domestic and export subsidies, and had been reduced by inflation. Moreover the restrictions of Article I made tariff-making in Australia unduly complicated. He argued too that the admission of Japan might make some higher tariffs necessary; Australia would not wish this to require increases in tariffs against Commonwealth countries. Finally, Mr. Crawford spoke of the possibility of developing certain Australian industries for regional defence purposes which might require some action along the lines envisaged in Article 15 of the ITO Charter. Mr. Crawford got no support at all for a frontal assault on Article I, but everyone was willing to examine sympathetically any specific proposals for waivers to meet special Australian difficulties. Mr. Johnsen however did give some support to the idea of a provision along the lines of Article 15 of the ITO Charter.

33. Mr. Jha reminded Mr. Crawford that many countries besides the United States were opposed to preferences. He had agreed that there was a lack of balance between say the GATT rules about QRs, and the freedom to use subsidies, but India's views on QRs were cast in non-discriminatory terms.

34. Mr. Plumptre pointed out that because of restrictions in Commonwealth countries the benefit of existing preferences to Canada was largely nullified. Canada expected that over the years the GATT would result in a gradual withering away of preferences and other barriers to trade. He warned that if the proposal to revalorize specific margins of preference was pressed, the idea of revalorization would probably spread to specific tariffs in general.

35. After further discussion Mr. Crawford explained that Australia was not looking for a general enlargement of preferences, but merely wanted to be free to negotiate adjustments where necessary. Australian officials had been looking for some formula in between outright attack on Article I and continued reliance on the waiver.

36. Mr. Cohen made a somewhat non-committal speech in which he did not rule out a case for making preferences negotiable in the same way as tariffs, but he thought such cases should be dealt with by the contracting parties ad hoc. Nor did he rule out revalorization, although again he thought the ad hoc approach should be followed.

37. The Colonial views on preferences are dealt with in paragraphs 39-42 below.

Tariffs

38. Mr. Plumptre made three suggestions for discussion:

(a) Universal rebinding of existing schedules, and a renunciation of the right to withdraw concessions under Article XXVIII;

⁶⁴ Voir/See Volume 18, Documents 570-607.

(b) a special procedure, continuously available, whereby countries would be given the right to renegotiate on special considerations and in exceptional circumstances;

(c) if this special procedure was granted, countries should try as far as possible to postpone recourse to it.

With the exception of Mr. Sanders, however, other delegates seemed unduly preoccupied with their several special difficulties and showed a disturbing lack of interest in rebinding.

Special Problems of the Colonies

39. Mr. Melville opened this discussion with a reasonable statement of the difficulties of the Colonies during which he proposed the following formula as a basis for dealing with these in the GATT Review:

"It is recognized that the maintenance of economic and social stability presents special problems in the case of small and structurally weak economies, in particular the economies of territories classified as 'dependent overseas territories'. Metropolitan governments associated with such territories — and the Governments of such territories themselves — therefore require the right to take such action from time to time in respect of regulations of tariffs and commerce as may be necessary for the preservation of economic and social stability, even if such action deviates from one or more of the Articles of GATT".

40. There followed statements by individual Colonial Advisers explaining their special difficulties. Most of them spoke in restrained and sensible terms. The last speaker, Mr. Bustamente, however, after pushing his coatsleeves well above his elbows plunged into an embarrassing tirade, whose flavour has entirely escaped the official record of the meeting.

41. Delegates of other countries showed great sympathy with the difficulties of the Colonies and a willingness to examine whatever proposals the United Kingdom wished to put forward to meet them.

42. Mr. Cohen thought the United Kingdom could hardly hope to negotiate a formula as broad as Mr. Melville had proposed, but felt it might be possible to get an amendment of Article XVIII designed to enable a metropolitan country to take action for the benefit of one of its dependent territories as if it were part of the metropolitan territory. What could be done under such a provision would vary from commodity to commodity.

General

The most serious difference of opinion was clearly that between the United Kingdom and Australian conceptions of the kind of trade rules that should apply after convertibility has been achieved. The Australians were particularly shocked when the United Kingdom first proposed the two-year time limit on QRs; and they have little more affection for the notion that QRs should be subject to the approval, even ex post facto, of the contracting parties.

CONFIDENTIAL. IMPORTANT.

REVIEW OF GATT

Following for Ritchie from Couillard, Begins: Guy Smith and I have had two long sessions with a group of State Department officials in which we covered, in varying detail, the main questions which will be discussed at Geneva. Present were Ben Thibodeaux (who has just been appointed Director of the Office of Economic Defence and Trade Policy), Leddy, Frank, Corse, Weiss, and a couple of others.

2. I made clear that I was talking with them informally and as a member of the Canadian Delegation rather than of the Embassy. I stressed that although I would be able to pass on to them some of the information gathered in London about the position of individual Commonwealth countries on various issues, I was not "reporting" on the recent Commonwealth talks.

3. As you will appreciate I had two main objectives in mind: (1) to obtain such new information as was available on the American position with respect to the main issues — this is summarized below; (2) to confirm and impress on these officials the strength of feeling towards and the resultant damaging effects of the United States inability to move forward in the agricultural field. I think our report on other countries' attitude — an attitude, as you will have seen from the London minutes, which permeates practically all the important issues to be discussed at Geneva — brought home to these officials a fuller realization of the adverse consequences of their position. Thibodeaux said (at our second meeting) that our report had already been passed on to Sam Waugh of course, and also to the "top people" in the Department of Agriculture.

4. The following summarizes the new information on the United States position which we obtained. On a number of issues (e.g. Article XVIII) they are still searching for a more or less final position.

(a) Two instruments. They will press for this in the hope that the first instrument, containing the organizational provisions, will be approved by Congress at its next session. Officials think that in doing so Congress will, in fact, (although indirectly and rather vaguely) be endorsing the Administration's commercial policy as embodied in the second instrument. Officials have in mind that both instruments will be drawn up for "acceptance" and definitive application. The functions of the organization as they will be contained in the first instrument will in no way be more limited than the present functions of the contracting parties acting jointly; indeed, they envisage that these functions will be expanded. As regards the perma-ment seats which are to be provided in the 15 — or 18 — country body which they propose, they have in mind that the provisions of the charter should be adopted.

(b) Export subsidy. They will agree to a provision in the Agreement for the application of the “fair share” principle, with mention made, if necessary, of the criterion of the “representative period”. They point out that this commitment represents some sacrifice for them (i.e. an act of bravery by the Administration) in that it probably goes further than existing United States legislation permits and that it will surely be considered by many in Congress as contrary to existing legislation: in entering into this commitment under GATT, the Administration would, in fact, be leaning on the President’s policy statement which in the opinion of many sections in this country was an unnecessary and over-liberal interpretation of existing legislation in favour of foreign countries.⁶⁵

(c) Agricultural import restrictions. There appears to be some backsliding in that officials now hope that some provision will be made in GATT which would remove the stigma of infringement now borne by the United States import restrictions. Their present plan is to agree that Article XI should stand but to change the date of 1947 which now appears in the Protocol of Provisional Application to 1955 and to write this date into the Agreement. The United States would then agree that the Agreement should provide for a review by the contracting parties of the progress made towards the lifting of restrictions which are contrary to the provisions of Article XI. Officials consider this solution necessary. Otherwise, they explain, Congress, in “endorsing” the provisions of the Agreement, would be in fact agreeing to obligations vis-à-vis which the United States had been labelled an infringer.

(d) Article XXVIII. You will have seen their proposal. It is their view that the contracting parties acting jointly would have to agree to such renegotiations as may be sought. Something which is new in their position, I think, is that if the contracting parties (acting jointly) do not agree or if there is no agreement reached by the individual contracting parties engaged in any given renegotiations, then the contracting party seeking the withdrawal of its concession will not, repeat not, be free to do so.

(e) Japan. They do not agree with the United Kingdom proposal and consider that GATT should have control over the terms and application of the bilateral agreements. They also want to ensure in some way that at least the major trading countries will share the responsibility of making room for Japan in the GATT.

(f) Enabling clause. They see no objection to such a clause which would permit the contracting parties to consider a widening of the scope of the Agreement provided no specific mention is made in the clause of commodity policy and agreements.

(g) Bilateral termination. They have abandoned the idea of proposing that provisions to this effect should be included in the Agreement. Ends.

Memorandum by Delegation to General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade

ICETP DOCUMENT NO. 170

[Ottawa], December 28, 1954

GATT REVIEW — POSITIONS AND POLICIES

1. In the current review of the GATT, the basic objectives of the Canadian Delegation have been,

(a) "new rules of trade", under stricter supervision by the Contracting Parties, to take effect at a future date to be agreed. These new rules envisage

(i) lessened use of quantitative restrictions when in balance of payments difficulties,

(ii) elimination of discriminatory restrictions;

(b) until these "new rules" come into effect, to provide for better enforcement of the existing rules and continued dismantling of existing restrictions;

(c) rebinding of tariff schedules, with minimum escapes, but recognition that some escapes are necessary.

2. The United States shares the above objectives but is not providing leadership or offering incentives sufficient for their attainment. The only incentives held out by the United States to other countries in Geneva are:

(a) the hope of reciprocal tariff negotiations under the Keane Bill, based on 5 percent reductions per year for three years, and on peril points,

(b) a willingness to consult, on the basis of a "fair share" principle, regarding the impact of their export subsidies on the markets of other GATT members.

On the negative side, the most important element in the American position is their request for a "waiver" from GATT rules to permit them freely to operate import restrictions under Section 22 of the A.A.A., which latter permits import quotas of 50 percent of a previous representative period or ad valorem fees of 50 percent. The United States is seeking blanket approval, not only of restrictions already imposed, but of agricultural import restrictions they may impose in the future. Not only is the United States thus asking a good deal of other countries in return for minor concessions from themselves, and seeking to be released from some of their own most important commitments, their negotiating position is further weakened by the emphasis they are placing upon a number of points to render GATT more attractive to Congress. In this latter category, special mention should be made of the United States refusal to cooperate even in the discussion of possibilities in the field of international commodity arrangements. Although their position in this matter is not inconsistent with the views held by ourselves and the United Kingdom, for example, it is regarded as a serious deficiency by a majority of GATT countries, including all of the under-developed countries. As a major contributor of economic aid to the outside world and as the major trading country, United States support of GATT was of crucial importance from the very beginning.

While the United States Administration might not regard itself as having joined the ranks of those who are weakening GATT, their negotiating position at this Session permits no other conclusion to be reached.

3. The United Kingdom is a stronger ally at the present session than the United States. As the principal sponsor of the Collective Approach to convertibility and to freer trade and payments, it is in a pivotal position in the negotiation of the "new rules of trade". Consideration of the "new rules of trade" has fallen into the doldrums, however. The United Kingdom is encountering resistance from some of its sterling area partners and from some of its OEEC partners. For the moment, they have lost the initiative they assumed in connection with the Collective Approach.

4. Another group, comprising the stronger trading countries of Europe, South Africa, and some Latin American countries, accept in principle the desirability of stricter long-term rules and a stronger Agreement, but are apprehensive about various problems which will arise along the way. Some feel they may need to adjust tariffs upward to replace the protective effects of restrictions. Others foresee the need for some import restrictions, especially in the agricultural field, more or less indefinitely. A weaker group, including most of under-developed countries along with Australia, New Zealand and some of the European countries, are in pursuit of objectives rather different from our own. While they are generally sceptical about the desirability of enforcing any "new rules of trade", they are in some cases in search of concessions from the high tariff countries and in other cases in search of solutions based upon commodity agreements.

5. In this situation the position of the United States aggravates:

(a) the position of those delegations that believe the present Agreement to be already "unbalanced" in favour of the United States and other industrialized and well-developed countries and against countries dependent on exports of food and materials, and

(b) the position of those delegations from industrialized countries which accept the long-term trade rules in principle but which feel some need to retain restrictions or adjust tariffs to care for "soft spots" in their own economies. In short the United States attitude undermines the position of almost all other delegations in greater or less degree, thus endangering the success of the Review Session.

6. One of the considerations of the United States Administration in desiring a review has been their hope of getting Congress to accept GATT and commit itself to membership in an organization administering the Agreement. Considerable stress is being laid on this point by the United States delegation in the Geneva discussions. It cannot be doubted that GATT would be on a firmer basis if the United States Congress was in some sense committed to it. It would not seem desirable, however, substantially to weaken the fabric of the Agreement itself by waivers or by amendments, in order to buy such approval. Moreover, it is doubtful whether the present is the most propitious time to put GATT to Congress, particularly in view of the hope that, at a later date, the United States might not have to seek such sweeping exemptions from the obligations of the Agreement in the field of agriculture.

7. From Canada's point of view, GATT would look very different if the United States Administration had, in effect, explicitly withdrawn from its agricultural obligations. This might not jeopardize the continued existence of the GATT nor would it necessarily prevent Canada's continuing participation in it. Our government, however, could not very well support a blanket waiver for the United States to impose agricultural import restrictions in the future. It would be an important policy decision for the Government as to whether it could accept such a waiver if the United States were to obtain the requisite support of two-thirds of the Contracting Parties in the face of our opposition. Further it would seem questionable whether the Government would wish to enter into any new tariff negotiations under GATT auspices as long as the results of past negotiations were overshadowed by such a withdrawal on the part of the U.S.

8. It would seem desirable that representations should be made to the United States Administration, at the earliest possible date and at the highest possible level. Such representations might cover the following points:

(a) An Appraisal, from the Canadian point of view, as to where the GATT Review stands. (It should be noted that only one U.S. official, and that a fairly junior one, returned to Washington from Geneva for the Christmas recess; and it is questionable whether senior U.S. officials, let alone Ministers, are fully aware of the position.)

(b) Exploration of possible changes in the United States position point in the hope of bringing the present Review to a reasonably successful conclusion within the next two months.

(c) Warning that Canada cannot accept the sweeping United States waiver now proposed and will have to oppose it, or anything like it, with the utmost vigour in the Conference.

(d) Indication that Canada would accept specific waivers covering existing United States agricultural restrictions for limited periods, as an evidence both of Canada's recognition of the special position and problems of the United States and of Canada's desire to bring the Review to a successful conclusion.

GATT REVIEW SESSION

1. The Chairman said that the Committee might first wish to be briefed on what had occurred at the GATT Review Session, and then perhaps discuss what action ought to be taken by Canada in the light of the impasse into which the Conference appeared to have fallen.

2. Mr. Plumptre said the real initiative for the Review Session had come from a number of small countries who thought the GATT was "unbalanced". These countries, who are generally more interested in commodity arrangements and other features discussed at Havana for the proposed ITO than in trade and tariffs, were eager to change the Agreement, which they had regarded as primarily a stop-gap arrangement. The United States was not providing the leadership expected of them in the GATT. Although they could have offered some concessions in the arrangement of an umbrella organization outside of, but related to GATT, for the working out of commodity agreements, they had taken a stand of unalterable opposition in this regard. On the other hand, certain countries like Australia were committed politically at home to obtain such changes in the GATT. The result was complete frustration.

The United States and the United Kingdom, who were both interested in the tightening of long-term trade rules, had not consulted with each other sufficiently before the Conference on the matter of tactics, and as a result had had disagreements over methods. The United Kingdom wanted to make the minimum changes in the Agreement necessary for tighter rules; the United States wanted a completely rewritten Agreement, partly because they desired to show a wholly new GATT to Congress. The two delegations at Geneva had at last put forth jointly a document which proposed that a country, upon getting into balance-of-payments difficulties, would be granted two years to extricate itself, within which time the country could impose restrictions subject to automatic consultation with affected Contracting Parties. Canada had tentatively supported this draft, but almost all other Contracting Parties were opposed to the two-year limit. There were indications that even the United States regarded the time limit as too stringent, and thought of it as a bargaining position.

Germany and South Africa had once supported tight long-term trade rules, but had now withdrawn that support. Germany had an agricultural interest in quantitative restrictions, and South Africa was demanding firm provisions against export subsidies before she would support tighter rules on other matters.

The United States was asking GATT to award her a waiver of her obligations not to impose quantitative restrictions on agricultural imports, and at the same time was holding out for a strengthened GATT in other respects. As a result, it was difficult to see how the Review Session could reach a reasonably successful conclusion in the next few months.

(An explanatory memorandum, "GATT Review, Positions and Policies", had been circulated — ICETP Document No. 170.)

2. The Governor of the Bank of Canada suggested that the United States might bargain for the waiver by relaxing its stand against commodity agreements. Mr. Rasminsky pointed out that the American opposition to commodity agreements in GATT was consistent with their stand in ECOSOC. Mr. Plumptre thought the United States opposition was not primarily a bargaining position, but could be used as one. He also observed that Canada's position on commodity agreements in general coincided with that of the United States.

3. Mr. Plumptre said the Americans, although inflexible at Geneva, were very eager to see the Review Session proceed. They were interested in "keeping up the momentum" of GATT and, more particularly, in obtaining the waiver and the separate organizational agreement so that the latter could be sent to Congress for approval at the next Session. They regarded the submission of the proposed organizational agreement to Congress as essential, and they considered that Congress would pass it only if GATT granted the United States a general waiver condoning past actions and explicitly allowing any future actions in the field of quantitative restrictions of agricultural imports. The United States was not likely to accept any time limit for the waiver, but the Contracting Parties could vote to withdraw it at any time in the future.

Mr. Coyne suggested that Canada should approach the United States and the United Kingdom in an attempt to have the Review Session postponed for about six months until the U.S. business recovery had progressed further, the agricultural situation had improved and there was a more settled appreciation of the effects of the new flexible price support programme. Under more favourable circumstances the United States might be willing to modify its demands.

5. Mr. Ritchie thought that the United States, and to a lesser degree, the United Kingdom, were satisfied with the way the Review was now going, and would not listen to a request that it be postponed.

6. Mr. Couillard pointed out that the smaller Contracting Parties would refuse to leave Geneva until more favourable provisions for the under-developed countries had been written into the Agreement. In addition, the United States wanted to submit the GATT to Congress in February, and would want the waiver granted and the organizational provisions drawn up by that time.

7. Mr. Plumptre and Mr. Barrow said they thought the United States would succeed in obtaining a waiver to cover both past and future actions. They could offer a weaker Article XVIII to win the support of the under-developed countries and could gain further support by offering to accept tighter controls on export subsidies. The French, Germans and Belgians were interested in seeing the principle of a waiver get into GATT, and would presumably support the United States. A flood of requests for waivers might come to GATT after convertibility was achieved and such countries as Germany could no longer impose restrictions for the special balance-of-payments reasons. Almost all the Contracting Parties were eager to see the Review achieve a successful completion, and were, moreover, willing to assume that it was essential that the GATT win Congressional approval. There was, therefore, a general willingness to give the United States what it wanted and thus to obtain from it the concessions necessary to make the Conference a success.

8. Mr. Reisman thought it was not necessary to assume that the waiver would be granted. Canadian-U.S. trade was the largest single operation carried on under GATT, and the United States might not wish to press for a waiver against vigorous Canadian protests. Canada might also win the Commonwealth countries and others like Denmark and the Netherlands to support her in opposing the waiver.

9. Mr. Couillard pointed out that complaints could still be made to GATT about the actions of a Contracting Party, even if these actions were condoned by a waiver, and retaliatory action could be taken by a country adversely affected, under Article XXIII. Members of the GATT Secretariat and Mr. Wilgress had said that Canada's best plan might be to complain to GATT while the waiver was being discussed, and seek compensation from the United States when the waiver was granted.

10. The Chairman said it would be difficult to claim compensation as soon as the waiver was granted, because the extent of damage to Canada from U.S. actions under the waiver could not yet be known. Canada could, however, use Article XXIII at any time to take retaliatory action.

11. Mr. McKinnon asked whether the tariff schedules would be left unchanged if Canada were successful in obtaining a postponement of the Review. Mr. Plumptre said that a postponement had not been discussed at Geneva, and he was, therefore, unable to answer the question. There was, however, a strong feeling at the Conference in favour of rebinding the schedules for three years. Mr. Reisman noted that if a series of waivers were granted, tariff revisions might be meaningless.

12. The Chairman wondered if it would be advantageous to try to have the discussions on the trade rules postponed until after the GATT had gone to Congress. Better trade rules might emerge if they were not negotiated while the United States was bargaining for support for the waiver and the organizational provisions.

13. Mr. Plumptre and Mr. Isbister said that the postponement of negotiations would entail an unfortunate postponement of the movement toward convertibility. The United Kingdom needed new trade rules to point to as essential preconditions of convertibility. It was not the place of Canada to urge postponement and thus to slow down the United Kingdom in its movement toward its goal. The United Kingdom had now a draft before the Review Session and presumably thought its provisions were good enough, if accepted, to make convertibility possible. Should the United Kingdom feel that negotiations at this time were going to result in weak trade rules, it was up to the United Kingdom to initiate a proposal of postponement.

14. Mr. Isbister said he considered that the best course for Canada was to say that although we would consider waivers for specific past actions, we were unalterably opposed to a general waiver for future actions of the United States under Section 22 of The Agricultural Adjustments Act. If we opposed the granting of a waiver and it was nevertheless granted, the United States would feel compelled to consult Canada before placing specific restrictions against our exports to the United States in future. Our bargaining position would therefore be strong. Our credentials for discussing quantitative restrictions with other countries who might also want waivers would also be improved if we stood in firm opposition to the U.S. request now.

15. Mr. Sharp suggested that if Canada declared at Geneva that she was opposed to a waiver for future actions by the United States, we might well be embarrassed by being asked to state a principle setting out the conditions under which we should be prepared to grant waivers in future. Refusal to declare such a principle would indicate unreasonableness. He reminded the Committee that in every case affecting us under Section 22 of The Agricultural Adjustments Act, we could not quarrel with the treatment we had received from the United States.

16. Mr. Isbister said such an idea had been considered but had been abandoned because it was clear that the United States would be unwilling to accept a limitation of principle on its future actions under Section 22. Congress would not approve GATT unless the waiver left Congress free to impose restrictions without being limited in power by an international agreement.

17. Mr. Plumptre said that while a declaration of principle would be advantageous in that it would give Canada a firm arguing position against waivers that went beyond the principle, it would be impossible to obtain its inclusion in the Agreement itself, where it should be. The preamble to each specific waiver would certainly refer to the past practice of the United States in giving freer access to its markets; such a reference would serve the purpose of a statement of principle and would be consistent with the U.S. position that no international commitment should over-ride domestic law.

18. Mr. Plumptre said he personally thought that Canada should be willing to consider a waiver condoning past actions of the United States under Section 22 because refusal to do so might bring upon Canada the blame of the Contracting Parties for making it impossible for the Review to achieve success. Mr. Plumptre noted that his Minister was very reluctant to contemplate the acceptance by Canada of any waiver for either past or future actions of the United States.

19. Mr. McKinnon said it appeared that all the past actions of the United States under Section 22, except one, could be justified under the present GATT. The United States, therefore, really wanted a free hand for future actions, and Canadian acceptance of a waiver for past actions would not satisfy the Americans.

20. The Chairman and Mr. Taylor pointed out that it would be the purpose of the Canadian position to embarrass the U.S. Administration when it attempted to take future actions under Section 22, and thereby to strengthen our negotiating position.

21. Mr. Rasminsky said the question now was whether Canada should place before the Review Session a statement outlining the terms under which we would accept waivers for past actions and declaring that we would not accept a waiver for future actions of the United States. It might be preferable for Canada to await the presentation of the waivers to the Conference before we said what our conditions of acceptance were.

22. Mr. Coyne and Mr. McKinnon suggested that Canada should declare her opposition to all waivers. If, then, a proposal for a waiver condoning past actions of the United States under Article 22 were presented, Canada could consider whether to accept it.

23. Mr. Plumptre pointed out the danger in saying that Canada was willing to "look at" specific waivers. If an eminently acceptable waiver were subsequently presented, we would hardly be in a position to turn it down. Yet, to avoid the charge that Canada had wrecked the Conference, we must declare our willingness to "look at" specific waivers.

24. Mr. Isbister suggested Canada need not declare a willingness to "look at" new requests for waivers in the future. We needed only to call attention to our willingness in the past to cooperate with the United States in an attempt to find solutions for her difficulties.

25. Mr. Plumptre said that immediate representations to Washington, at a high level, seemed the only means by which Canada could hope to prevent the United States from obtaining the general waiver.

26. The Chairman said that since it was not yet known whether the representations would be made by Ministers or by the Canadian Ambassador to the United States, the Committee might feel it wise to draft instructions to the Ambassador on the matter.

27. Mr. Coyne suggested that a visit of Ministers to Washington would be more desirable if it was the intention of Canada to obtain concessions from the United States on the matter. If it was our purpose only to record our opposition to the granting of a waiver, representations could be made to that effect by the Ambassador.

28. The Committee agreed:

(a) that immediate representations should be made in Washington, at a high level, concerning the problem created by the request of the United States for a waiver of its obligations under GATT not to impose quantitative restrictions on agricultural imports;

(b) that the representatives should:

(i) express the concern of the Canadian Government that the U.S. request for a waiver would have a damaging effect on the continued development of healthy commercial relations between the two countries and upon the Review Session of the GATT; and

(ii) urge that the Government of the United States should not press forward with a request for a waiver which the Canadian Government would have no alternative but to oppose; and

(c) to meet again on Friday, December 31, for further consideration of the representations to be made to the United States Government.

REPRESENTATIONS TO THE UNITED STATES

1. The Chairman asked if it was yet known whether Ministers would be able to go to Washington next week or whether the representations regarding the U.S. request for a waiver from GATT obligations would be made by the Ambassador.

2. The Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce said the Minister of Trade and Commerce was prepared to go to Washington any day next week. The Minister of Finance and the Secretary of State for External Affairs could go only on Thursday, January 6.

3. Mr. Ritchie said that the Canadian Embassy had been asked to try to arrange a meeting of the Ministers with the Secretaries of State, Agriculture and the Treasury, and with Mr. Sherman Adams on Thursday. If a meeting could not be arranged for Thursday, the Minister of Trade and Commerce would meet with members of the U.S. Cabinet on any other day in the week. The meeting would not be considered to be a session of the Canada-U.S. Ministerial Committee.

4. The Chairman asked whether the Ministers concerned had concurred with the line of action proposed by the Committee at its meeting on Wednesday.

5. Mr. Bull said the Minister of Trade and Commerce agreed that a waiver for future actions under Section 22 of The Agricultural Adjustments Act was unacceptable. Canada would consider specific waivers for past actions and decide upon them separately.

6. Mr. Plumptre said the Minister of Finance had indicated that he would accept any waiver only with reluctance. The Minister of Finance would probably concur with the position taken by the Committee.

7. The Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the Secretary of State for External Affairs was in general agreement with the line proposed by the Committee.

8. The Committee considered a draft representation to the Government of the United States, which had been circulated (ICETP Document NO. 171)† and suggested certain drafting changes.

9. Mr. Rasminsky asked whether the representations would carry the implication that, if the waiver were granted by the Contracting Parties, Canada could not accept the new General Agreement.

10. The Chairman pointed out that the representation did not commit Canada to such an action if the waiver were granted. A GATT with a waiver might be preferable for Canada to no GATT at all.

11. Mr. Ritchie said that he had just been informed that a meeting had been arranged with the U.S. Secretary of State for the afternoon of Thursday, January 6th. An attempt would be made to have the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Agriculture at the meeting.

12. The Committee:

(a) noted that a meeting had been arranged to take place in Washington on Thursday, January 6th, between the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Finance, and members of the U.S. Cabinet; and

(b) approved, subject to the suggested changes, the draft representation to be made to the Government of the United States.

POSSIBLE EXPULSION OF CZECHOSLOVAKIA FROM THE INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND

You may recall that last October the Executive Board of the International Monetary Fund had under consideration various complaints which had been laid against Czechoslovakia in connection with its failure to fulfil its obligations under the Fund's Articles of Agreement. At that time the United States was pressing for action to declare Czechoslovakia ineligible to use the resources of the Fund under Article XV(2) which could, in due course, lead to the expulsion of Czechoslovakia.

Our position at the time was that while expulsion of Czechoslovakia from the Fund would have the disadvantage that it might remove any opportunities to influence Czech policies through the discussions in the Fund, it would be undesirable to condone serious breaches of obligations by member countries in important international organizations, particularly financial ones. Moreover, there would be serious difficulties in adopting what might be interpreted as a "soft" policy towards a Communist State's breach of the Articles of Agreement which might bring us into open disagreement with the United States. In the circumstances, the view of the Departments concerned was that the Czechoslovaks should be given every opportunity to explain their position but if they did not give a definite indication of cooperating in a reasonable way with the Fund the Canadian representative should be prepared to support a declaration of ineligibility under Article XV. When this matter came up for discussion last November there was agreement among the majority of the members of the Executive Board that Czechoslovakia had failed to fulfil its obligations under the Articles of Agreement and therefore should be declared ineligible to use the resources of the Fund. A decision to this effect was recorded by the Board.⁶⁶

We have just been informed through our Alternate Representative, Mr. Warren, that the United States is now proposing that the Board of Executive Directors recommend to the Board of Governors that the Government of Czechoslovakia be required to withdraw from membership in the Fund. The Government of Czechoslovakia has been notified of this proposal which will be discussed by the Executive Board on July 7th.

In the view of Mr. Rasminsky, the interpretation of the Articles of Agreement advanced by the representative of the United States may be open to question. In his opinion the relevant Articles of Agreement might be interpreted equally well to mean that the failure of Czechoslovakia to fulfil its obligations would not necessarily require any action by the Fund to expel this member. In actual practice the Fund has never resorted to expulsion of any member for failure to fulfil its obligations but instead has adopted a more moderate attitude with respect to breaches of obligations under the Articles of Agreement. Mr. Rasminsky feels that the position to be adopted by the Canadian representative should depend largely on political considerations. It seems fairly evident that the United States has primarily political motives in pressing for expulsion at this time. Mr. Warren has reported that several of the representatives of other countries have expressed their misgivings about the wisdom of the United States' proposal. A number of directors appear to be in favour of not making any recommendation to the Board of Governors but simply passing on to them a full statement of the facts for their consideration. The legal aspects of such a step by the Executive Board are now being considered by the legal authorities in the Fund.

At our request Canada House has reported that the United Kingdom Treasury and the Foreign Office do not consider it advisable for their representative on the Fund to take any firm stand on this issue until Czechoslovakia has had an opportunity to present its case, at which time the United Kingdom will consider its attitude with respect to the desirability of supporting the United States' proposal to expel Czechoslovakia from the Fund. The United Kingdom Treasury are not inclined to think that a decision to expel Czechoslovakia would be particularly embarrassing at the present time but the Foreign Office apparently are not so optimistic in this respect. The Foreign Office are somewhat concerned that Czechoslovakia might make a "kind of half-way reply" so forthcoming that it could not be rejected out of hand, yet not sufficiently satisfactory to dispose of the issue. Such a situation obviously might create some difficulties in the sense that the United Kingdom and Canada might be put into the position of having to decide whether to disagree openly with the United States if the latter should still press strongly for expulsion.

Our alternate representative to the Fund has informed us that it is likely there will not be any interval following the consideration of the Czech case by the Executive Board on July 7th during which Governments might have an opportunity to re-examine their position in the light of the arguments advanced by the Czech representatives. Mr. Warren will be sending us in the near future a report on the way the lines are being drawn along with information on the extent to which other countries are in default of their obligations under the Articles of Agreement of the Fund. In the circumstances and pending Mr. Warren's further report on the situation, we are giving serious thought to the following considerations in consultation with the Department of Finance:

(a) The political desirability, or otherwise, of supporting the United States' proposal to expel Czechoslovakia from the Fund;

(b) The value, if any, of continued Czech participation in the Fund bearing in mind the fact that expulsion may mean virtual Czech withdrawal from participation in the GATT which is likely to be working more closely with the Fund in the near future; generally speaking we are in favour of encouraging the active participation by the U.S.S.R. and the satellites in the work of the Specialized Agencies, and expulsion from the Fund at this moment might have an unfortunate effect;

(c) The distinctive features, if any, of the default of Czechoslovakia as compared with the breaches already committed by other members of the Fund, particularly Nationalist China and France;

(d) The situation surrounding the expulsion of Czechoslovakia from the International Bank (which has already taken place);

(e) Any reports which we may receive concerning the attitudes of other members of the Fund, particularly the United States and the United Kingdom;

(f) The importance which we should attach to the relationship, if any, between the expulsion of Czechoslovakia from the Fund and the understandings recently arrived at during consultations which were held in Ottawa with the delegation from Czechoslovakia on trade and financial matters.

We felt it advisable to bring this matter to your attention at this stage. After we have had an opportunity to give further thought to this problem in the light of the considerations which we have outlined above we plan to submit for your approval recommendations regarding the instructions which might be sent to the Canadian representative to the Fund. Since it is our understanding that you will be leaving Ottawa for a brief period commencing July 1st, we plan, if you agree, to forward such recommendations for your consideration on June 29th. Your colleague, Mr. Abbott is being apprised of the situation by officials in his Department. Mr. Rasminsky is away in London but we are keeping in touch with other officials in the Bank.

POSSIBLE EXPULSION OF CZECHOSLOVAKIA FROM THE INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND

In my memorandum to you of June 23rd on this subject, you will recall that I outlined for your information a list of the main considerations which officials in this Department and the Department of Finance felt should be borne in mind in formulating any instructions for the Canadian representative. In addition, I mentioned that we expected a full report from our representative which would assist us in determining the Canadian attitude.

The attached telegram from Mr. Warren covers pretty well most of the main points we have in mind and shows quite clearly the way the lines are being drawn. You will observe the rather interesting comparison which might be drawn between this case and the default of France in 1948. The main difference, of course, is that, unlike Czechoslovakia, France has been a cooperative member of the Fund and the French Executive Director has continued to participate actively in the discussions of the Fund.

I might draw your attention to the compromise proposal (paragraph 10) which would meet the United States' desire to expel Czechoslovakia and at the same time give the Czechs a further period in which to bring themselves back into good standing, and the rather promising sign that the United States' Director has agreed not to press the issue to vote at the July 7th meeting (paragraph 11).

We have studied this telegram in the light of the information already available and, in consultation with officials in the Department of Finance, we suggest that it would be appropriate to send our representative preliminary instructions along the following lines:

(a) Mr. Warren should support the United Kingdom and other representatives in pressing for an interval following the meeting on July 7th during which period Governments would have an opportunity to consider final instructions in the light of the case presented by the representative from Czechoslovakia;⁶⁷

(b) should it prove necessary to vote at the July 7th meeting on a recommendation for the expulsion of Czechoslovakia the Canadian representative should support any compromise proposal receiving substantial support which would have the effect of giving the Czechs a reasonable time within which to mend their ways (e.g. a recommendation to the Board of Governors that Czechoslovakia be expelled at the end of 1954 unless the Executive Directors should in the meantime make a contrary recommendation);⁶⁸

(c) if it appears quite certain that any efforts to either postpone the issue or to give the Czechs an opportunity to bring themselves back into good standing (along the lines of (a) and (b) above) will not receive sufficient support, the Canadian representative, rather than come into open disagreement with the United States, should vote in favour of a straightforward recommendation for expulsion by the Board of Governors. (An alternative which you might wish to consider would be to authorize our Representative to abstain in these circumstances).⁶⁹

I would be grateful for an expression of your views. Your colleague, Mr. Abbott, is being consulted by officials in his Department.

POSSIBLE EXPULSION OF CZECHOSLOVAKIA FROM THE I.M.F.

Following for A.E. Ritchie from Warren, Begins:

(1) Features of Czechoslovakian Default

In November last, the Fund declared Czechoslovakia ineligible to use Fund resources because of failure (a) To furnish the minimum information necessary for the effective discharge of the Fund's duties (Article VIII section 5(a); and (b) Failure to consult the Fund in accordance with Article XIV section 4 as to the further retention of restrictions inconsistent with Article VIII.

2. In connection with the above decision, you will be aware that Czechoslovakia has refused to provide information on national income, exports and imports, and balance of payments on so-called security grounds, and has pleaded technical inability to provide information on prices. While it is the continued failure of Czechoslovakia under (a) and (b) above which is the formal basis of United States complaint and demand for withdrawal, there are a number of other features about

⁶⁸ Note marginale :/Marginal note:
OK [L.B. Pearson]

⁶⁹ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

I would not object either to expulsion or abstention if those chiefly concerned — and the Dept of Finance — could decide which course to pursue L.B. P[earson]

the Czech case which are factors in any judgement about Czechoslovakian relations with the Fund. You will remember that in June of last year Czechoslovakia changed the par value of its currency without consulting the Fund, and argued that this action did not require Fund concurrence because it did not effect the international transactions of members. The Fund rejected this argument and decided that the change which had been made in the Czech par value did not fall under Article IV section 5(e).

3. The United States will argue that in addition to the specific issues mentioned above Czechoslovakia has, in a general sense, been a relatively uncooperative Fund member. In this connection Southard points out that other countries which have had technical difficulty in providing all the information required have, nevertheless, remained in close consultation with the Fund, and have done their best to overcome statistical short-comings. By contrast, the Czech attitude has been defensive, and fruitful consultations have not been possible. He recalls also that since the Czech Director walked out some years ago on the issue of the presence of a representative of Nationalist China, the Czech Governor has not voted in Fund elections.

(2) Breaches of Obligations of Other Fund Members

4. I am unable to provide a full list of the many individual departures by members from the Articles of Agreement. The staff has advised that this information is not readily available and would require considerable research. The situation is that nearly all countries have at some stage, and in some way, failed to live up to the letter of the Articles. For the most part the Fund has felt able to countenance these technical breaches, and in a number of cases Fund policy has been adjusted to situations which have developed. Only in the case of France and Czechoslovakia has the Fund actually made a declaration of ineligibility to use Fund resources.

5. The following are examples of failures on the part of members to observe the strict obligations of the Fund, but which have not resulted in the imposition of sanctions. (a) China, Greece, Indonesia, Italy, Thailand and Uruguay have not yet established a par value, and in consequence have not yet paid that part of their subscription which is due in their own currencies. (b) Canada and Peru no longer observe the par value of their currencies in exchange transactions. (c) Many multiple currency countries from time to time introduce rate changes in their exchange systems without prior consultation with the Fund. (d) Various countries, including South Africa, permitted premium sales of gold at a time when this was regarded as contrary to Fund obligations. (e) While the situation has considerably improved, there was a time when the Fund was not receiving adequate economic information from a number of South American countries. This is probably still true of Uruguay and Paraguay, although these countries have consulted with the Fund.

6. In relation to the Czech problems, the French situation is particularly interesting. In January 1948 France consulted the Fund about the proposed devaluation of its currency and the concurrent introduction of a premium market for convertible currencies. The Fund was not prepared to concur in the free market proposal, which involved multiple currency practices and currency discrimination. Despite the Fund objection, the French went ahead and in the circumstances the Fund concluded that France had made an unauthorized change in its par value, and had, therefore, become ineligible to use the Fund resources. Now, six years later, France has still not made its peace with the Fund on this issue, but no one has proposed that France should be expelled from the organization. In all other respects, France has of course been a most cooperative member of the Fund, and the French Executive Director continues to participate actively in Fund discussions.

(3) Present Attitude of Other Members on Czechoslovakian Case

7. The United States position is pretty clear — unless Czechoslovakia gives concrete evidence of a desire to behave as a normal Fund member, Southard will be pressing a recommendation for expulsion. He tells me he can count on the support of six or seven Directors, which would suggest that he has lined up the South American countries, China, a couple of the European countries, and possibly Japan.

8. The Executive Directors for the United Kingdom, India, Australia, Scandinavia, and the Middle East countries are opposed to action at this time leading to the expulsion of Czechoslovakia when the Governors meet. It is, however, not possible to report how they will vote on the issue, since their final attitude will be determined only after the Czech representative has been heard. It is reasonable to expect that all of these countries will support any formula which can be devised which would either postpone the issue or at least give the Czechs more time. Prasad of India has been authorized to vote against the United States proposal even if he is in a minority of one. However, he has also been given discretion in the matter, and in the final analysis may abstain and conceivably could vote in favour of a compromise resolution which was generally acceptable.

9. In my letter to Rasminsky of June 7,† I referred to the difficult position of Saad, the Middle Eastern Director, who represents countries which may well have opposing views on the issues of Czechoslovakian expulsion. I understand Saad's suggestion that the Executive Board should not make a substantive recommendation and should leave the matter entirely to the Board of Governors has not won much support amongst his colleagues or in the staff. The consensus is that the Board must consider the matter and make the best recommendation possible in the circumstances.

10. On the assumption that the Czechs prove unwilling to mend their ways, some Directors are considering the possibility of a compromise recommendation which would meet the United States desire to expel Czechoslovakia and at the same time would give the Czechs a further period in which to bring themselves back into good standing. The thought is that the Executive Board might recommend to the Governors that Czechoslovakia be expelled at the end of the year unless the Executive Directors should, in the meantime, make a contrary recommendation. This solution would not only give the Czechs additional time, but would bring the date of expulsion from the Fund into line with that of expulsion from the Bank. As you know, Czechoslovakia will automatically cease to be a member of the Bank as of December 31 of this year unless before then action is taken in the matter of the non-payment of the balance of their Bank subscription.

11. In sending instructions on the general issue, perhaps you would also comment on the above compromise, which I understand would be acceptable to the United States. Incidentally, at Hall-Patch's insistence, Southard has agreed not to press the issue to a vote at the July 7 meeting. There is to be an interval in which Executive Directors will have an opportunity to consult their governments before a vote is called. For what it is worth, my personal guess is that, reluctant as the United Kingdom will be to see Czechoslovakia pushed out of the Fund, it will not, in the final analysis, vote against the proposal for expulsion. Particularly at a time when United States support is needed for the convertibility operation, I should be surprised if the United Kingdom would wish to add the Czech case to the important political issues which are bedeviling United Kingdom-United States relations at this time. One thing at least seems certain, and that is that the United States, having precipitated the question will not be able to accept any solution short of a recommendation for expulsion at some time in the not too distant future. The United States motivation is political, and for this, if for no other reason, they are unlikely to prove receptive to contrary arguments based on action taken in the Fund in other cases which may appear to be comparable. Ends.

[Ottawa], July 15, 1954

Dear Jack [Warren],

The comprehensive outline of the Czech situation contained in your teletype message of June 24th was very helpful in the consideration given here to the possible expulsion of Czechoslovakia from the Fund.

As you are aware the general policy of the Government is to encourage the active participation of the U.S.S.R. and satellite countries in U.N. agencies. We have ourselves just concluded fairly satisfactory arrangements with the Czechs on certain outstanding trade and financial matters, and this is a particularly inopportune time for us to join in an expulsion move.

On the other hand, the tone of the Czech reply to the Board's invitation to the July 7th meeting is certainly not conducive to a sympathetic attitude. Indeed, the most important difference between the Czech case and the other cases of default listed in your teletype message is that the other countries have shown some willingness to cooperate with the Fund while the Czechs have not. In these circumstances, and having in mind that expulsion is a final sanction which is not mandatory on the Executive Board in the case of a member which failed to fill its obligations, it would seem to us desirable that the Czechs should be given a further opportunity to show their willingness to cooperate. This could be reconciled with the apparent American determination to press this matter to a decision immediately by action along the lines suggested in paragraph 10 of your teletype message of June 24th.

Accordingly, the instructions by which you should be guided are the following:

(a) If the U.K. obtains sufficient support for a decision to allow an interval following the next meeting of the Board before any vote is taken you should concur in such a postponement to allow Governments time to prepare final instructions in the light of whatever case is presented by Czechoslovakia. It is not felt, however, that an interval is essential since it seems unlikely that the Czechs will have very much new to add to the arguments they have already advanced.

(b) Should it prove necessary to vote at the meeting on a recommendation for the expulsion of Czechoslovakia you should support any compromise proposal receiving substantial support which would have the effect of giving the Czechs a reasonable time within which to mend their ways. Such a compromise proposal might be a recommendation to the Board of Governors that Czechoslovakia be expelled at the end of 1954, unless the Executive Directors in the meantime make a contrary recommendation.

(c) If it appears certain that any efforts along the lines of (a) or (b) above to either postpone the final decision or give the Czechs an opportunity to re-instate themselves will not receive sufficient support, and there is a vote on the straightforward recommendation for immediate expulsion by the Board of Governors, you should vote affirmatively rather than come into open disagreement with the United States.

Thought has been given to the possibility of abstaining in the situation described in (c) above, but it has been decided that you should not abstain. The purpose of abstention would be to express disapproval of the tactics employed by the United States rather than any disagreement in principle, but it is feared that our abstention would be interpreted as an unwillingness to take a definite stand on the substantive issue.

Yours sincerely,

L. RASMINSKY

Alternate Representative to International Monetary Fund to Deputy Governor of Bank of Canada

[Washington], July 27, 1954

Dear Jim [Coyne]:

In Lou's absence on leave, I am again writing to you on Fund's matters. This letter will bring you up-to-date on the discussions we have been having on the U.S. complaint that Czechoslovakia has continued its failure to fulfill the obligations of the Agreement concerning consultation and the provision of information and should, therefore, be required to withdraw from the Fund.

There have been two lengthy meetings so far and we are still a long way from any decision on the recommendation to be made. The Czech representatives are not offering to provide any additional information about their economic and financial position but are arguing that the Fund cannot now proceed to take expulsion action because, in their view, certain prior legal requirements have not been fulfilled.

Their position is that the November 4 decision of ineligibility was not taken as a sanction against Czechoslovakia but rather in recognition of a factual situation and that expulsion action under Article XV, Section 2(b), can only be taken if the precedent action under 2(a) was in fact taken as a sanction. Their second main argument is that a declaration of ineligibility under XV 2(a) and expulsion action under 2(b) are only permissible if a member fails to fulfill its obligations without having a legal justification. In this connection, they emphasize that the question of their justification for withholding information was not fully considered in the discussions leading up to the November 4 decision and go on to argue that the national security interest of Czechoslovakia is a valid reason in international law for denying information required by the Fund. A third legal argument which the Czech representatives have advanced is that the phrase "after the expiration of a reasonable period" in XV 2(b) must mean after the expiration of a specified period — as you know, no special period was prescribed in the November 4 decision on ineligibility.

The procedural arguments so far put forward by the Czechs have been vigorously opposed by Southard and their interpretation of Article XV has been disputed by the acting Legal Counsel who has given the preliminary opinion that the only prerequisite to action under Article XV, section 2(b), in a case of this kind, would be a declaration of ineligibility under section 2(a) and the passage of a reasonable but unspecified period. In the circumstances, the Czech representatives have taken the position that a question of interpretation of the provisions of the Agreement has arisen and have asked for the decision of the Executive Directors under Article XVIII. The staff is preparing a paper on the points which the Czechs have raised and when this is available the Board will consider whether in fact there is a question of interpretation, and if so how the Article should be read. It is interesting to note that if there is a question of interpretation the Czechs under Article XVIII(b) could appeal the decision of the Executive Directors to the Board of Governors.

This morning, on the understanding that the discussion was without prejudice to the procedural points raised at the first meeting, there was a debate of the substance of the issue in which the Czech stated the reasons which in their view justify the withholding of information on exports, imports, balance of payments and the national income. The burden of their argument, as was the case last year, is that the U.S. is waging economic warfare against Czechoslovakia and the other "socialist" states, has improperly discriminated against them and that as a measure of self-defence and for security reasons Czechoslovakia is obliged to withhold vital statistics about its economy.

The question of whether or not a member may withhold information on grounds of national security may prove to be the central issue in the debate. While the Articles of Agreement are silent on the subject of exceptions to the obligations for security reasons, this question has arisen in the past in connection with the restrictions of current payments and transfers to Communist China by the United States and Cuba. The Fund's policy on that occasion is spelled out in Executive Board decisions 144 and 145 of August 14, 1952, to which you may wish to refer. You may also wish to look at Article XXI of the GATT which is quite specific on the point and provides nothing in the Agreement requires any contracting party to furnish information the disclosure of which it considers contrary to its essential security interest.

So far, only Southard, Saad (Middle East) and Prasad (India) have taken an active part in the discussion with the Czech representatives. The interventions of the latter Directors have been designed to elicit arguments from the Czechs, particularly those relating to national security, which the Board might conceivably be prepared to recognize as adequate reasons for withholding information. Southard, on the other hand, while quite prepared to listen to any explanations which the Czechs wish to give, does not consider that the national security argument is a valid reason in the case of Czechoslovakia for denying the Fund economic and financial information. He is pressing for a quick decision on the grounds (a) that the Board took all the factors into account when it decided last November that Czechoslovakia had failed to fulfill its obligations and was ineligible, and (b) that a reasonable time has now elapsed without any modification of the position. In response to the argument advanced by Prasad that other countries have failed to fulfill their obligations and that no one is pressing for their expulsion, Southard argues strongly that the cases are not parallel in that all other countries (including France which has been declared ineligible) have consulted and cooperated with the Fund whereas Czechoslovakia has not done so and refuses to supply information without which the Fund cannot effectively discharge its obligations.

I think that the instructions given to me by Lou in his letter of July [15] are fully adequate for the present. If, however, as may well be the case, the debate eventually turns on the question of whether a member has the right to withhold information on grounds of national security it would be helpful to have your additional views. Against the possibility that you would wish to discuss this question with External Affairs I am taking the liberty of sending a copy of this letter to Ed Ritchie.

The next meeting to discuss the Czech case is scheduled for Thursday afternoon; additional meetings may be required and it then seems likely that there will be an interval to permit consultations with governments before a vote is taken on any recommendation to the Board of Governors.

Yours sincerely,

J.H. WARREN

P.S. The lawyers may wish to look over the attached extract from the verbatim transcript of the first meeting with the Czechs which sets forth their interpretation of Article XV.

Dear Jack [Warren],

My personal reaction to your news of the legal tactics of the Czechs is amusement rather than concern.

I will not comment on the procedural points, particularly as you expect there will be an interval to permit consultations with governments before a vote is taken. As regards the point that a nation should not have to provide information if it deems such disclosure to be contrary to its national security, it seems to me that the Czechs are pushing this point rather too far. Clearly there might be particular items of information which a country might under some circumstances feel it had to withhold for reasons of national security. If, however, a country feels it must withhold all information whatsoever it seems to me tantamount to saying it is unable to co-operate with the other members of the Fund and should for reasons of national security resign from the Fund, unless, that is, the Board of the Fund agrees that special circumstances exist, presumably of a temporary character, which justify the stand taken by the country concerned. In the present case, obviously the Board would not make any such finding, and on the point of substance, therefore, I would say the Czechs have made no good defence to the proposal that their membership in the Fund should be terminated.

Yours sincerely,

Washington, August 3, 1954

Dear Jim [Coyne]:

Many thanks for your letter of July 29th and the helpful comments on the Czech case which it contained. I don't think anyone down here is being taken in by the legal manoeuvring of the Czech representatives, but some of the questions they have raised are rather tricky and require careful handling.

We have now carried the debate to the point where the discussion has been adjourned to permit consultation with Governments. The next meeting will be on August 11, when the first item of business will be a vote, if necessary, on the question of interpretation, followed by a resumption and, it is to be hoped, a final discussion of the substance of the United States complaint.

The greater part of Friday's meeting, which ended at midnight, was again taken up with interpretation. Without going into details, the tentative sense of the meeting was to give the following bare bones answer to the various questions posed by the Czech delegation:

"In response to the request of the Government of Czechoslovakia, and after having considered the arguments put forward by that Government, the Executive Directors, acting pursuant to Article XVIII (a) of the Fund Agreement, interpret Article XV, Section 2 as follows:

Action may be taken by the Fund to require a member to withdraw if the following conditions are met:

1. The member has been declared ineligible to use the resources of the Fund pursuant to Article XV, Section 2(a);
2. A reasonable time has passed since the member was declared ineligible to use the resources of the Fund pursuant to Article XV, Section 2(a), whether or, not a fixed period of time had been prescribed in connection with such action, and the member persists in failing to fulfill its obligations;
3. The member has been informed in reasonable time of the complaint against it and given an adequate opportunity to state, both orally and in writing, any fact or legal argument relevant to the issue before the Fund."

At one stage we almost reached an affirmative vote on the above interpretation but the Indian and Scandinavian Directors asked for time to consult their Governments and the Belgian Director had some reservations about the wording. The Czech spokesman maintained throughout the discussion that the suggested decision was quite inadequate in that no interpretation was provided for Article XV, Section 2(a), particularly whether the phrase "fails to fulfill" means the mere fact of non-fulfillment or non-fulfillment without a valid justification recognized by International Law (i.e., national security). In the circumstances the Czech delegation has reserved its position on the question of interpretation pending an opportunity to consult with its Government. On the relevance of the question of national security most speakers took the line that while this factor would be considered in deciding what action to recommend under Section 2(b), it did not provide an automatic exception from the obligations of the Articles of Agreement and therefore could not be invoked to interpret Article XV in the sense suggested by the Czechs.

In addition to Frank Southard, statements on the substance of the United States complaint have now been made by the United Kingdom and Australian Directors, the Latin American representatives, and the Director for India. Increasingly it looks as though there will be a pretty overwhelming vote for expulsion. Rickett for the United Kingdom has stated that he will support the United States complaint without reservation (a shift in position), as have the Latin American Directors. The Australian representative, while regretting the necessity of considering the expulsion of a member, has also implied that he will vote for compulsory withdrawal. Only the Indian Director, with some support from the Far Eastern representative, has argued for continued Czech membership. Prasad has pointed out that Czechoslovak non-cooperation has arisen from action which it considers has been taken against it by the United States, that the failure of Czechoslovakia to provide information has not hurt anybody or greatly impaired the Fund's work, that Czechoslovakia has already been declared ineligible and that no particular advantage would flow from its expulsion and that expulsion would be a more severe penalty than the Fund has taken in respect to members which have been in breach of other Articles of Agreement.

In response to these arguments Southard and others who are in favor of compelling Czechoslovakia to withdraw, have drawn a pretty clear distinction between the conduct of members who, although in technical breach of one or other of the obligations, have continued to consult and cooperate actively with the Fund, and Czechoslovakia which has not. A good deal has also been made of the point that the supply of information is a basic obligation and is vital for the effective discharge of the Fund's duties.

The United States Executive Director has privately circulated the attached draft decision, which you will see recommends that Czechoslovakia be expelled as of December 31, 1954, unless the Executive Board determines prior to then that Czechoslovakia has provided the information required and entered into consultation with the Fund. In accordance with instructions, I would propose to support this decision when it is put forward on August 11.

Yours sincerely,
J.H. WARREN

Washington, August 11, 1954

Dear Jim [Coyne]:

POSSIBLE EXPULSION OF CZECHOSLOVAKIA

The Executive Board this morning completed its action on the U.S. complaint against Czechoslovakia. I attach a copy of the decision taken, the effect of which is to recommend that Czechoslovakia be required to withdraw from the Fund as of December 31, 1954 unless the Executive Directors determine prior to then that Czechoslovakia is supplying the information required under Article VIII, Section 5 and has entered into consultation under the provisions of Article XIV, Section 4.

Those supporting the recommendation were, in addition to the United States, the Directors for the United Kingdom, Australia, the Southern European countries, Germany, China, the Far East, the two South American Directors and Canada. The Directors for India, the Middle East, Scandinavia, and, surprisingly, Belgium and the Netherlands and France disassociated themselves from the decision. The action of these three Directors was unexpected and apparently reflected last-minute instructions received from their Governments.

The Netherlands representative indicated that in his opinion the recommendation for expulsion was too severe in the circumstances. Godeaux for Belgium took the line that the recommendation was undesirable because it seemed to close the door to possible improved relations between Czechoslovakia and the Fund at some future time. Saad, the Middle Eastern Director, opposed the recommendation on the grounds that the question of national security raised by the Czechs was a matter of international law which could not properly be dealt with by the Board; for this reason he considered that only a factual report on the situation should be made to the Board of Governors. Prasad (India), the most vigorous spokesman against action leading to expulsion, came closest to supporting the Czechoslovakian contention that they were justified in withholding economic information from the Fund. His final statement was inter alia to the effect that the Board had not given adequate consideration to the national security case advanced by the Czechoslovak representatives. In this connection he seemed to suggest that the Board should have gone into the counter-charges levelled at the United States by Czechoslovakia in order to form a judgment whether the reaction of Czechoslovakia, i.e., the withholding of information, was justified. He again brought out the point that no positive advantage would accrue to the Fund by Czechoslovakian withdrawal.

The French spokesman indicated that his Government was quite prepared to recommend that Czechoslovakia withdraw at the end of the year, but considered the question of whether or not before that time Czechoslovakia had rectified the situation by supplying the required information and entering into consultation should be reserved to the Board of Governors, and not left to the discretion of the Executive Board. This point may well come up in the Annual Meeting — as a practical question I doubt that it matters too much one way or the other except perhaps that a decision by the Executive Directors would be administratively more convenient.

In the end there was no vote and the decision was taken as the “sense of the meeting”. The record will, of course, show which countries supported the decision and which contracted out for one reason or another.

The first business at the opening of the meeting was to take a decision on the interpretation of Article XV, Section (2). I attach the text of the interpretation adopted,† which was approved without a vote. The Indian Director made a statement for the record to the effect that in his view the interpretation was narrowly legalistic, did not deal with some of the broader points raised by the delegation of Czechoslovakia and showed rather less flexibility than had been the case in previous Board interpretations of other Articles of the Agreement.

As soon as the interpretation had been adopted, and not unexpectedly, the Czechoslovakian representative, in accordance with Article XVIII (b), asked that the matter be referred to the Board of Governors. He also asked that further consideration of the case be deferred until the Governors had given their decision on the question of interpretation. The ruling was that while Czechoslovakia was fully within its rights in appealing the Board's interpretation to the Governors, there was nothing in Article XVIII (b) to prevent the Executive Board from going ahead and making its recommendation on the substance of the United States complaint.

As the matter now rests, there will be two questions in relation to the Czech case before the Governors; first, the appeal from the Board's interpretation of Article XV, Section (2) and, second, the action to be taken on the Executive Board's recommendation arising from the United States complaint.

You will be receiving copies of the corrected verbatim transcript of today's meeting as soon as they are available.⁷⁰

Yours sincerely,
J.H. WARREN

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 130-54

[Ottawa], May 13, 1954

CONFIDENTIAL

PROPOSED INTERNATIONAL TIN AGREEMENT

On November 4, 1953, the Cabinet approved of Canadian participation in the United Nations Tin Conference which convened in Geneva on November 16, 1953 and from which emerged a proposed International Tin Agreement designed to stabilize international trade in tin by preventing the development of either shortages or burdensome surpluses. This Agreement calls for the establishment of an International Tin Council in London on which both producers and consumers would be represented with the voting power of each producing country related to its past production and that of each consuming country to its past consumption. A buffer stock (financed entirely by producers) will be established which, together with possible export and (indirectly) production restrictions, will be used to maintain fluctuations in prices within a given range. The Agreement establishes, as an initial basis for operations, a floor price of £640 (sterling) and a ceiling price of £880 (sterling) per long ton.

2. As Cabinet was informed in a Memorandum of November 3, 1953, Canadian import requirements for tin are not great and the direct interest of Canada on a tin agreement is small. The initial price range in the proposed Agreement was arrived at after intensive negotiations and is subject to alteration by the Council on which Canada and other consumers would have votes equal to those of the producers. The proposed Agreement would involve no commitments for Canada to impose domestic controls or to agree to import quotas. Except for membership fees, the proposed Agreement would impose no direct financial obligations on Canada. The question of Canadian participation in the Agreement would therefore appear to be affected primarily by broader economic, strategic and political considerations.

3. It will be recalled that when the question of Canadian participation in the United Nations Tin Conference was before the Cabinet, it was recognized that the Canadian attitude toward a possible tin agreement would depend in part on the willingness or the unwillingness of the United States to participate. On March 5, 1954, the United States formally advised interested governments, including Canada, of its decision not to sign the Agreement, apparently for a variety of reasons including the domestic political situation. At the same time, the U.S. Administration announced its conviction that the Agreement could operate without the participation of the United States and that the United States would have no objections should other governments decide to proceed with it. Privately, U.S. officials have indicated that the attitude of the U.S. Government goes further than "benevolent neutrality"; it is apparent that the Executive Branch of the United States Government are anxious to have the Agreement come into force and are prepared to give informal encouragement to other countries to take part.

4. The decision of the United States not to participate in the Tin Agreement has meant that the attitude of less important consuming countries with respect to participation will be of major importance in determining whether the Agreement is to come into force or not. A rough analysis has led to the conclusion that the attitude of Canada may well be decisive. Representatives of a number of interested governments, including those of the United Kingdom, Belgium, and the Netherlands, have expressed the strong hope that Canada will accede to the Tin Agreement.

5. The question of Canadian participation has been examined by the Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade Policy. It was noted that the successful operation of the Agreement might represent a useful contribution to the economic and thus to the political stability of tin producing areas. It was observed that Canadian association with Asian countries, not only in the Commonwealth but also in the Colombo Plan, lends special weight to this consideration. From the strategic standpoint, the view was expressed that an effective tin agreement might well lessen possible emergency shortages of tin. It was suggested that the Agreement, with its provisions for consumer participation, might be preferable to the likely alternative of a producer cartel. It was noted that most of the countries interested in this agreement are already parties to the Wheat Agreement and that the attitude of certain other countries (e.g. the United Kingdom) toward the Wheat Agreement might conceivably be influenced somewhat by our decision on tin. The general view of the Interdepartmental Committee was that, for political reasons, it might be desirable for Canada to participate especially since there appeared to be no disadvantages for Canada in such participation.

6. Consideration should be given to the possible desirability of:

(a) giving authority to N.A. Robertson, Canadian High Commissioner in the United Kingdom, to sign the International Tin Agreement, subject to ratification;⁷¹

(b) informing other interested Governments of the decision of Canada to sign the Agreement. Where appropriate the reasons for the Canadian decision — including our interest in the future of the Wheat Agreement — should be communicated to interested governments.

7. In the event that a favourable decision with respect to Canadian participation is reached, Ministers may wish to consider the manner and timing of any discussion of the Agreement in the Canadian Parliament. In this respect, it will be recalled that when the International Sugar Agreement was tabled in the House, an announcement was made of the intention of the Government not to accede to the Agreement until the House had an opportunity to study its provisions and to offer any comments or submit any questions with respect to its provisions. This opportunity to discuss the Sugar Agreement is to be afforded to the House when the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce are under consideration.

CANADIAN MUTUAL AID TO GREECE

I am prompted to write to you following the recent visit of Air Commodore Millard and Wing Commander Fincham of the R.C.A.F., with whom I discussed various aspects of the Canadian Mutual Aid Programme for Greece, and upon further consideration of the present Mutual Aid machinery. There is no doubt that the present machinery, insofar as Canadian aid is concerned (as described so fully in your memorandum attached to your despatch No. D-31 of February 1, 1954)[†] is cumbersome and slow to the extreme. Even more important, it certainly does not allow Canada to obtain the maximum credit due to our country for its very substantial contributions to our fellow members of NATO. Because Standing Group's approval is always required, and because bids are submitted by recipient countries to Standing Group in the first instance, it makes it very difficult to preserve the purely Canadian nature of our various contributions. Even though it is true that the Canadian Government in the end must first approve Standing Group's recommendations, undoubtedly the S.G. calls the tune and, in effect, directs the Canadian taxpayer's dollars to particular NATO countries. From the standpoint of the Canadian mission in Greece, for example, this means that very often Canadian Mutual Aid is confused with American Military Aid, in some form or other, and full credit is not given to us. (Such confusion is very likely to become even more evident when, as I was horrified to learn, a newly-affiliated NATO staff officer (American) serving as a liaison officer on the Greek General Staff, expressed his complete ignorance about Canada's Mutual Aid Programme to Greece.) I think it was, therefore, a very good thing that the R.C.A.F. sent its own officers to Greece to discuss Canada's F-86 jet programme direct with the Greek Air Force. I believe that Air Commodore

Millard has suggested that an R.C.A.F. officer be attached to our Embassy for the purpose of dealing with the many details connected with our jet programme for this country. This, too, is, I believe, an excellent idea and should be implemented. Nevertheless, I think that Canada will not obtain the full credit due to her unless some new NATO machinery can be developed to enable the needs of NATO countries, such as Greece, to be submitted direct to the Canadian Government when Canadian equipment is required. We could determine their availability and then initially assess for ourselves the desirability of filling the request. NATO Standing Group advice would, of course, be sought, especially on a large transfer, such as that of our F-86's. It is on smaller requests, such as aircraft spares, that the slow and awkward machinery becomes so manifest. I was told, for example, that if Canada knew that a certain type of piston were required by Greece, this could have been included on Canada's availability list and usefully disposed of.

2. I am not sufficiently acquainted with the technical details to make intelligent recommendations at this time for improving the system. However, I do believe that it would be most worthwhile for the Head of our NATO Division to have a lengthy discussion with Air Commodore Millard who, I feel sure, will be pleased to outline the difficulties which he has from the matériel point of view. From the point of view of proper publicity and credit for Canada's very substantial Mutual Aid contribution to her NATO allies, and to ensure that the Americans do not always call the tune in countries such as Greece (which they are wont to do following the very substantial American aid of various sorts given to Greece in the past several years), I think that active consideration should be given to ways and means of changing the machinery so as to make it more direct. This would not only result in countries such as Greece realizing that Canadian Mutual Aid is quite separate and distinct from American, but it would, I am told, greatly reduce the long timelag under the present system between the first step and the last step, i.e., the actual delivery of the equipment. Furthermore, it would enable us to know what was required before drawing up our availability lists, and it would establish a closer direct working relationship between the Greek and Canadian armed forces.

3. I might perhaps illustrate the type of irritation with which I am constantly confronted by citing two recent examples, both having to do with American (i.e., Standing Group ?) influence. When this has to do with the Canadian Government's Mutual Aid Programme, I think it is time that we sat up and took notice. In a recent conversation which we had with a First Secretary in the American Embassy, we mentioned that we might, at some stage, have a Canadian Air Force officer attached to the Embassy to deal with our jet programme. (He, of course, already knew — well before we did — that Canadian jets would be given to Greece — a further irritant!) His first reaction was that this was a natural thing for us to do "to protect our tax-payers' money". But then he said, "I hope that he won't make any suggestions (to the Greeks) which are contrary to the 'advice' which we are giving them." A more important example is concerned with the question of Canada training Greek pilots or other aircrew members under the other phase of our Mutual Aid Programme. At a small informal dinner given by the Greek Air Force for Millard and Fincham, I casually asked Air Vice Marshal Doukas, the youthful Deputy Chief of the Greek General Staff, whether the Greeks had contemplated requesting air crew training for Greek airmen in Canada. He said they would like to very much but that the Americans (sic) had said "No!" I gathered that the Americans had told the Greek Air Force that if they sent aircrew for training in Canada they would not receive all the American military aid promised them. As it was not convenient to seek further details at that time, I did not pursue the subject. However, I think it is worthwhile mentioning it to you at this time, particularly as I heard something else about American opposition to Canadian aid for Greece a few days ago. Mr. Eli Dimitracopoulos, an energetic though sometimes not too reliable Greek journalist for the Athens newspaper Kathimerini, recently returned to Athens after a visit of several weeks to the United States (and Montreal). While in Washington, he told me that he had several talks with our Admiral deWolfe (Chairman, Canadian Joint Staff), of whom he spoke in glowing terms. Dimitracopoulos mentioned that the Americans had been opposed to Canada supplying jet aircraft to Greece and to the training of Greek aircrew in Canada, but that some, at least, of the difficulties had been finally overcome through, I gathered, Canadian efforts in Washington. As Dimitracopoulos is a reporter, I did not press him for details, but I could easily do so. I could also, if you wish, call on Air Vice Marshal Doukas and obtain further information from him because he is a close neighbour of mine. However, before doing so, I wanted to consult the Department to find out how interested we are in taking some initiative in this matter. Up to then, I had thought that Greece just wasn't interested in training its aircrew in Canada. I naturally wonder what this so-called American "opposition" is all about.

4. In summary, therefore, I would suggest

(1) that the Head of our NATO Division have a talk with Air Commodore Millard about his matériel problems under the present NATO Mutual Aid set-up;

(2) that, after that talk, (not only to assist Millard's work but, more important, to promote the realization of the true nature of Canadian Mutual Aid and to give Canada more direct initial say in the allocation of its equipment and more direct contract with Greek (in my case) military officials, without American "interference"), active consideration be given to trying to have the machinery streamlined and altered to some extent; and

(3) that we find out why the Americans are opposed to Canada training Greek aircrew and, if the reasons are not sufficiently valid from Canada's point of view, that we pursue the matter further with the Greek authorities. As you know, Greece is one of the very few NATO countries which does not participate in Canada's NATO air training programme.

5. While on the subject of Canada's Mutual Aid Programme for Greece, I should like to raise the question of publicity for our contribution of F-86 jet aircraft to Greece. You will recall that as long ago as last March (our letter No. 158 of March 29th),[†] we suggested that simultaneous press releases be made in Ottawa and Athens. Not having heard from you about such a press release, and having taken up, on your instructions, the question of having a public ceremony to mark the arrival of the first Canadian jets in this country, we assumed that you had decided not to publicize this contribution until the proposed public ceremony took place. On their part, the Greek authorities have conscientiously avoided up to now making any public reference to the gift of Canadian aircraft. However, today's Greek newspapers carry an announcement, apparently originating in the Department of National Defence, Ottawa, that Canada is giving 27 F-86 aircraft to Greece and to Turkey. Probably the visit of the Chief of the Turkish Air Staff influenced this decision to make the matter public at this time, but nevertheless, from our point of view, you will appreciate that it would have been infinitely better for a release to have been made simultaneously in both capitals. Incidentally, I should appreciate knowing as soon as possible when the first aircraft will be delivered to Greece and consequently when the Public Ceremony is to take place. I should also appreciate confirmation that it is your intention that the ceremony take place here in Athens. Air Commodore Millard seemed to be under the impression that our plan was to have the ceremony in the United Kingdom. Needless to say, such a locale would be most undesirable as there is already enough confusion in the Greek public mind about Canada, the United Kingdom and the Commonwealth. In any event, the U.K.'s standing in Greece at the present time is beclouded by the Cyprus issue. I might also mention that Millard told me (and, subsequently, an officer of the Greek General Air Staff confirmed this to me) that the Greek Government is making arrangements with the American Air Force to fly our aircraft to Greece from the United Kingdom. This is an understandable economy move on Greece's part as we do not pay the transportation bill. However, from the point of view of retaining, for publicity purposes, the purely Canadian nature of this contribution, I wonder whether it might not be possible for at least the first of these aircraft (the one or ones to be used for the public ceremony) to be flown to Greece by the R.C.A.F. I think that you will agree that such an arrangement would be much more desirable. I shudder to think what confusion would be created if the photographers snapped pictures of an American aircrew stepping out of our first Canadian jet to reach this country.

6. This letter is far too long but I thought that it might be worthwhile for me to set down all of my rambling thoughts in the one spot. You might consider that some at least of them are worthy of serious consideration.

G.K. GRANDE

NATO ANNUAL REVIEW 1954

Following for submission to the NATO Secretariat is the Canadian statement on the 1953 Annual Review recommendations. Text Begins:

1. In their Resolution on the 1953 Annual Review, the North Atlantic Council requested member governments to furnish a brief written statement to the Council by 15 June, 1954, upon their progress towards implementing the firm force goals and the recommendations made to them, whether so far accepted or not.

2. Canada expects to meet the force goals agreed to for 1954 with the following forces at agreed standards of readiness.

(a) An Air Division of 12 squadrons of 300 day fighters.

(b) A Brigade Group in Europe, to be built up to a division as soon as possible after M-Day.

(c) A Naval force consisting of one carrier with two air groups and 42 escorts to be provided at various times between M-Day and M plus 180.

(d) Provision of 28 maritime aircraft.

3. With regard to the recommendations made to Canada during the 1953 Annual Review, it will be recalled that the Minister of National Defence, at a meeting of the North Atlantic Council in December, 1953, made a statement in which he emphasized that Canada had now arrived at the point where a large percentage of the defence budget is being taken up with the maintenance of the forces in being, with the resultant effect that there is not very much latitude for changes in policy or for increased commitments in any direction.

4. The question of additional requirements under the Canada-US Regional Group is being given further consideration since the release of information that the Soviet Union may have available after 1956 the H-bomb and the facilities for delivering this type of weapon to the North American Continent. The radar network and associated interceptor forces are being built up as rapidly as practicable. In addition, a further early warning chain is to be constructed beyond the settled part of Canada. It should be borne in mind that this increased air defence of the Canada-US Region will be an additional drain on the man-power and resources available for defence purposes.

5. Four of the recommendations contained in the Canadian Country Chapter of the 1953 Annual Review may be considered major problems. These refer to the provision of a wing of all-weather fighters for SACEUR, the timing of the first division, the improvement in time-phasing of naval vessels and the increase in numbers of naval vessels and maritime aircraft.

6. With regard to all-weather aircraft, provision of a wing of all-weather fighter squadrons in addition to the existing four wings of day interceptors is not possible. However, the implications of the substitution of all-weather fighters for a proportion of the day interceptors now assigned are being explored.

7. Canadian views on the timing of the first division have not changed. It is understood that the problem of the transportation of troops is at present under study by the Standing Group and our detailed views, including our movement problem, have been forwarded to the Standing Group.

8. Canada is continuing studies to determine what improvements in time-phasing of existing ships in Reserve can be accomplished. Every effort will be made to increase the availability of escort type ships, but until the current studies are completed, no changes in the present assignment of Naval Forces can be considered. Plans and specifications are in preparation for a 24 knot A/S escort vessel suitable for rapid production in wartime. Until the current programme for replacing present maritime aircraft is completed, it will not be possible to consider an increase in the number of patrol aircraft allotted to NATO.

9. With regard to providing replacement of Canadian type equipment held by European NATO countries, our comment on this recommendation during the 1953 review still stands. As for the problem of increasing and expediting production of all-weather aircraft, we are endeavouring to establish an economic rate of production which will ensure that the aircraft industry can be maintained over a prolonged period.

10. The remaining recommendations refer primarily to logistic support of Canadian forces. The implications of these recommendations have been and are being considered carefully. This consideration is expected to result in improvements to the present logistic support situation. Text Ends. Message Ends.

DESPATCH E-895

Ottawa, June 21, 1954

PROPOSED SUBSTITUTION OF SWIFT AND HUNTER AIRCRAFT FOR THE F-86'S
SUPPLIED BY CANADA TO THE UNITED KINGDOM UNDER MUTUAL AID

Attached, for your own background information, is a very tentative draft Memorandum on this subject which was discussed on June 15 by the Panel on Economic Aspects of Defence Questions. Also attached, for your information, is a copy of a memorandum to the Acting Under-Secretary† which was prepared prior to the discussion of this subject by the Panel.

2. The conclusion reached by the Panel and subsequently agreed to by Mr. Pearson and Mr. Claxton was that the U.K. and U.S. authorities might be approached and informed that the proposed transaction contains elements which might be embarrassing to Canada and which might create difficulties in securing support here for future mutual aid programmes unless the transaction is carried through with considerable care. It is expected that the matter will now be discussed by Cab-

F-86 AIRFRAMES SUPPLIED TO THE UNITED KINGDOM
UNDER THE CANADIAN MUTUAL AID PROGRAMME

Following a Cabinet decision on October 3, 1951, the United Kingdom was supplied with some 370 F-86 airframes, with necessary spares, to a total value of approximately $71 million. (The bulk of the engines for these aircraft was supplied by the United States under its military aid programme). In addition, consistent with our general policy governing the provision of spares for equipment supplied as mutual aid, Canada is now supplying spare parts for the maintenance of the airframes which were transferred to the United Kingdom.

It has been learned through Canadian service channels that the United Kingdom wishes to trade its present holdings of F-86 aircraft (including equipments supplied by Canada) for U.K.-produced Hunter aircraft which the United States have already undertaken to purchase with U.S. military aid funds. It is understood that the United States would then re-transfer the F-86 aircraft as U.S. mutual aid to other countries such as Italy, Western Germany (after ratification of the EDC or similar treaty) and Yugoslavia.

The United States Air Force has emphasized that from the logistic standpoint, the proposed transaction with the United Kingdom makes sense. It would permit the grouping of Hunters in Northwestern Europe, i.e. the United Kingdom, Holland and Belgium, with the United Kingdom being in a position to maintain them. The F-86s would be grouped in Southern Europe, i.e. Italy, Greece, Turkey and Yugoslavia. Despite the apparent military advantages, it is obvious that other factors are involved in this general type of arrangement which require careful consideration. Even though title to these aircraft has formally passed to the United Kingdom, it would seem essential to avoid any possible misunderstanding and hence criticism of the arrangement in Canada. The effect on other NATO countries, many of whom were anxious to receive these aircraft originally, must also be considered.

This problem has now been examined by the Panel on the Economic Aspects of Defence Questions which has recommended further discussion with the U.K. authorities in order to make our views known. Accordingly with the concurrence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I recommend that

(a) The Canadian High Commissioner in London together with the Chairman of the Canadian Joint Staff in London should be authorized to discuss this matter formally with the appropriate United Kingdom authorities and indicate to them that the proposed transaction contains elements which might create difficulties in securing support in Canada for future mutual aid programmes unless the transaction is handled with considerable care. While the F-86 aircraft and related equipment were made available by Canada (following a Standing Group recommendation) with no legal strings attached, they were supplied under Canadian legislation designed to increase the individual and collective capacity of NATO to resist aggression. Accordingly, we would expect that if there is no longer a U.K. requirement for the equipment, the United Kingdom would request the Standing Group to approve the suggested exchange of aircraft so that, if necessary, the Canadian public could be informed that the transaction had been determined by the NATO authorities to be in the best interests of the defence of the NATO area. In this connection, it would be made clear to the U.K. authorities that any public statement regarding the transaction should be agreed to by the Canadian Government. With respect to the provision of spares for the overhaul of these aircraft, U.K. authorities should be advised that it is Canadian policy to provide, when practicable, continuing spares as mutual aid for aircraft transferred to NATO countries in order to keep them in operation for the defence of the NATO area. In accordance with this policy Canada will continue to make available to the United Kingdom maintenance spares in a generous amount while the Canadian airframes remain in its possession. It would however be contrary to Canadian policy to provide as mutual aid overhaul spares intended to make the F-86 aircraft available for purposes other than those of the original allotment. There would of course be no objection to the United Kingdom purchasing additional spare parts from Canada, if necessary, for overhaul purposes; and

(b) that the Canadian Ambassador together with the Chairman of the Canadian Joint Staff in Washington should be authorized to discuss this matter formally with the appropriate U.S. authorities and inform them that Canada is requesting the United Kingdom to seek the Standing Group approval of the transaction in order to give assurance to the Canadian public if necessary, that this exchange of aircraft does in fact improve the NATO defence position, for which purpose the early allotment of F-86s was provided. If the Standing Group endorses this proposal Canada would not have any objection to the proposed U.S.-U.K. exchange of F-86s for Hunter aircraft.

DISPOSAL BY EUROPEAN COUNTRIES OF MUTUAL AID EQUIPMENT

Your telegram requested guidance as to the proper procedure for the disposal by Norway of Norseman aircraft received from Canada under mutual aid and now surplus to Norwegian requirements. It is understood that, as there was no other NATO requirement, these aircraft were "cannibalized" and used to meet Norwegian spare parts requirements. While this particular problem has been solved satisfactorily, it has been necessary to give careful consideration here to the policy questions involved with a view to providing you with general guidance for the future.

2. As you know, Canadian mutual aid equipment is supplied to NATO countries with no legal strings attached. On the other hand, under the U.S. military aid programme, title to equipment transferred to NATO countries cannot be transferred without the express consent of the U.S. Government. Moreover, arrangements are made with recipient nations for the return to the United States of equipment or materials no longer required for the purpose for which they were originally made available. The reason for this difference between the Canadian and the U.S. mutual aid programmes is of course obvious. Canada relies on the Standing Group (or the Secretariat) to recommend an allocation of equipment made available and hence complex agreements between Canada and the recipient government governing the end use of the equipment, its eventual disposition etc. have not been considered desirable or appropriate. It is assumed that the allocation recommended by the Standing Group would maximise the individual and collective capacity of NATO to resist aggression.

3. In order to make our position clear, consideration is being given here to the desirability of requesting you to make a statement before the NATO Council, at some appropriate opportunity, setting forth the Canadian Government's desiderata with respect to any re-transfer of Canadian mutual aid equipment originally offered through the Standing Group. In such a statement you might indicate that Canadian military aid equipment was supplied under Canadian legislation designed to increase the individual and collective capacity of the NATO Countries to resist aggression. Accordingly, the Canadian Government would expect that where a significant amount of Canadian mutual aid equipment was no longer required by the original recipient and where it would appear that a NATO requirement for the equipment might exist, the Canadian Government would expect that the equipment would be made available through the Standing Group to meet such a requirement. Your statement might also point out that the adoption of any other procedure for the re-transfer of Canadian mutual aid equipment might create difficulties in securing support in Canada for future mutual aid programmes. You might also request that any public statement regarding the re-transfer of Canadian mutual aid equipment in individual cases should be agreed to by the Canadian Government.

4. You will recognize that before any statement such as referred to in the previous paragraph is made, the approval of Ministers would have to be obtained. Before seeking such approval, I should appreciate any comments which you may have to offer.

CANADIAN MUTUAL AID PROGRAMME: F-86 AIRFRAMES SUPPLIED TO THE UNITED KINGDOM UNDER THE CANADIAN MUTUAL AID PROGRAMME

In accordance with your instructions, we called yesterday at the State Department on Ben Moore, Director of the Office of European Regional Affairs, to express the views of the Canadian Government on the proposed exchange of aircraft by the United Kingdom. We were represented by LePan, Brigadier Bishop (who is acting as the Chairman of the Canadian Joint Staff in the absence of Admiral De Wolf) and McCardle. Horsey, the Officer in Charge of Commonwealth Affairs at the State Department, and Kranich of Moore's office, were also present.

2. We began by outlining the factual basis for our representations as it had reached us through service channels. We said that the Canadian Government had learned that the United Kingdom wishes to exchange the F-86 aircraft which it now holds for Hawker-Hunter fighters produced in the United Kingdom and to be paid for by the United States out of mutual security appropriations. It was our understanding that, according to present plans, the F-86's would be re-allocated to Italy, Western Germany, and Yugoslavia. The Canadian interest in this transaction arose because 370 F-86 airframes had been supplied to the United Kingdom by Canada under our mutual aid programme at a cost of approximately $103 million. We also referred to the very tentative approach that had been made to us early in May by the Canadian Desk at the State Department, at which time it was indicated that a note on this subject might be expected shortly. In the event, however, the note had been held up.

3. There were two points which we wished to make in connection with this proposed transaction, we explained. In the first place, the Canadian Government did not wish to stand in the way of this exchange if suitable arrangements could be worked out. It was appreciated in Ottawa that there might well be considerable logistic advantage in a regrouping which would result in the United Kingdom and the low countries using Hawker-Hunter fighters while F-86's would, for the most part, be concentrated in Southern Europe. This point, however, hardly required elaboration, we thought, since it had already been made through Canadian service channels.

4. The second point was new and therefore required more stress. The proposed transfer had been considered by the Defence Committee of the Canadian Cabinet and a decision had been reached that Canada could not disinterest itself in it. It was true that title to the F-86 airframes had passed to the United Kingdom with no legal strings attached. But the airframes had been supplied by Canada to the United Kingdom under legislation which was designed to increase the individual and collective capacity of NATO countries to resist aggression. There might be misunderstanding and criticism in Canada if it could be charged that the airframes were not being used in accordance with the intent of the legislation. For this reason, the Canadian Government had a number of suggestions to make concerning the way in which the transfer should be arranged and the way in which it should be announced and presented. Accordingly, the Canadian High Commissioner in London and the Chairman of the Canadian Joint Staff there had been instructed to tell the United Kingdom authorities that, if there was no longer a requirement in the United Kingdom for the airframes, the Canadian Government would expect the United Kingdom to request the Standing Group to approve the suggested exchange so that, if need be, the Canadian public could be informed that the transaction had been determined by the NATO authorities to be in the best interest of the defence of the NATO area. It was also being pointed out to the United Kingdom authorities that the form of any announcement of the transfer would be of interest to the Canadian Government and that its agreement should be sought in advance on the text of any public statements or releases.

5. We then explained the position of the Canadian Government concerning the supply of spare parts for these airframes. At present Canada was providing spare parts to the United Kingdom, under its mutual aid programme, on the basis of recommendations made by the Standing Group. If, as a result of the proposed exchange, some, or all, of these aircraft were to be re-allocated to other NATO countries, the Canadian Government would be willing to consider supplying spare parts under its mutual aid programme, provided that the Standing Group made a recommendation to that effect. Under Canadian legislation, however, it would not be possible for Canada to supply spare parts under its mutual aid programme to other than NATO countries. Further, it was assumed in Ottawa that it would not be United States policy to request Canada to provide mutual aid in the form of spare parts to the United States.

6. After this initial statement of Canadian views had been made, Brigadier Bishop added that it was the hope of the Canadian authorities that the Standing Group would approve, not only the exchange of aircraft between the United Kingdom and the United States, but also their ultimate re-allocation by the United States to other countries. He indicated further that he had already spoken to General Whiteley, the United Kingdom representative on the Standing Group, about this matter and has stressed that any publicity given to the transfer should avoid casting reflection on the qualities of the F-86 as a fighter plane. General Whiteley had undertaken to bring this point to the attention of his service superiors in Whitehall. Brigadier Bishop hoped that it would be borne in mind by the United States authorities as well. He also drew attention to the possibility that public criticism of the transaction in Canada might make it more difficult in future to secure mutual aid appropriations from the Canadian Parliament.

7. Moore said that his initial reaction was that the Canadian conditions were reasonable. His only further comment was to re-emphasize the logistic argument in favour of the proposed exchange. Throughout, the transfer had been advocated by the United Kingdom authorities on these grounds and not at all because they doubted the qualities of the F-86's. Horsey said that it would be useful to the State Department if we could furnish them with the exact text of the relevant part of the Canadian legislation under which the airframes had been originally supplied by Canada to the United Kingdom. In answer to this request, we read out the text of the passage from the Defence Appropriations Act, 1950 as it is reproduced in the first para of the memorandum forwarded to us under cover of your despatch E-895 of June 21 to the High Commissioner in London. Moore and Horsey agreed that it would be useful to them in the consultations they must now have with the Department of Defence and with the Foreign Operations Administration if we could give them an aide-mémoire summarizing the Canadian views. Our immediately following telegram† contains the text of an aide-mémoire which we submitted this morning.

8. We received the impression from the State Department officials who were present at the meeting either that this question has been in abeyance for several weeks, or that the State Department has not been kept informed of the most recent developments. Horsey did make one off-the-record comment which is perhaps worth passing on to you, although we are not sure how seriously it should be taken. He said that he believed a deliberate attempt had been made by the United States service authorities to avoid submitting this matter to the Standing Group. Consequently, the Canadian representations, reasonable though they were, might necessitate an important change of thinking in the Pentagon.

CANADIAN MUTUAL AID PROGRAMME: F-86 AIRFRAMES SUPPLIED
TO THE UNITED KINGDOM

In accordance with the telephone conversation this morning between MacKay and LePan referring to paragraph 6 of your message, you should inform the State Department that the Canadian authorities would not expect that Standing Group approval would be sought for the ultimate re-allocation of these aircraft by the U.S. to other countries. As indicated in recommendations (a) and (b) of the paper approved by the Cabinet Defence Committee, our intention was to ensure that the proposed U.S.-U.K. exchange of Hunters for F-86's (insofar as the latter had been supplied by us under Mutual Aid) carried the endorsement of the Standing Group as being in the best interests of the defence of the NATO area. Such a determination by the Standing Group would make it clear that our Mutual Aid was serving the purpose specified in our legislation. We had not intended to become involved in the subsequent re-allocation of the F-86's once they had come into the possession of the United States.

Even if we might have desired to follow the transaction through the subsequent stages, it was our understanding that it would have been impracticable (if not contrary to U.S. law) to require that the United States secure the approval of the Standing Group for its proposed redistribution of the aircraft. In these circumstances, to have insisted on such a requirement might have prevented the U.S.-U.K. exchange from taking place. Moreover, it was doubted that these aircraft, once they had been turned over to the United States would be distinguishable from other F-86's of U.S. origin which the U.S. authorities might be distributing as military aid. Finally, it was by no means clear that we would be wise to lay down conditions regarding the possible retransfer of these aircraft, especially since non-NATO countries might be involved and neither we nor the Standing Group might wish to comment on the particular destinations proposed.

We understand that General Foulkes has also dealt with this subject in his message C.C.O.S. 83 of July 12† to the Canadian Joint Staff in Washington. In any approach to the State Department you will doubtless wish to keep in touch with the Joint Staff.

Ankara, July 26, 1954

Dear Mr. Pearson:

I am about to suggest that I be authorized to spend two or three days in Ottawa and I am putting the proposal in a personal rather than official letter so that it can be quickly and quietly turned down if you consider that such is the treatment it deserves. I had thought of writing to Bert MacKay but decided that I might thereby place him "on the spot" and so my letter is being directed to the level where a negative answer can be given without a twinge.

My experiences of the past 20 months have made it abundantly clear that there is lacking in Ottawa a full appreciation of conditions in this part of the world and in particular, of the situation in this country. We have had some frustrating experiences in the immigration and economic fields but they were not of sufficient importance to do more than create the hope that I could modify certain views and procedures when I get back on home leave.

In recent months, however, I have had cause for concern in connection with our Mutual Aid Programme. There have been a number of representations I have wanted to make concerning its operations but I think it could only be done effectively in person. For example, many months ago, I put forward some suggestions concerning our Air Training Program which were turned down by the Chiefs of Staff Committee, but I noticed in a document received a few weeks ago that Mr. Claxton had held a meeting of E[xternal] A[ffairs] and Nat[ional] Def[ence] officials in which he uttered my exact words. I have no doubt that my correspondence failed to make my point with sufficient clarity.

I would like to place before Ottawa a suggestion, with supporting reasons, for a basic change in our Mutual Aid policy — at least insofar as Turkey is concerned. I would like to discuss the problem of English language training for Turkish pilots on which the Turks are pressing me. I might not achieve my objective but we could dispose of the matter, one way or another, on the spot.

While I would like to have a brief discussion with you on the general problems it is particularly with the Minister of Defense, Charles Foulkes and Bud Drury that I would like to sit down around a table. It would be time-saving — and in the long run money-saving — to have some direct conversations on these subjects.

Turkey is not Western Europe — although I fear that sometimes we act as though it were. The U.S. experience has been similar as witness the fact that during my period in Ankara, the U.S. Ambassador has been back to Wash[ington] four times and the head of the F.O.A. Mission three times to clear up matters in brief discussions. I hasten to add that it has not been this U.S. "junketeering" which has sown the seed in my mind. The best evidence of this is that months ago I wrote to Bud Drury to see if he could come over here. I was in the midst of correspondence with Mr. Claxton about the possibility of his visiting Turkey, when he resigned. Then I wrote to Mr. Campney and he has explained quite understandably in a letter received to-day that it will be a little time before he could be in a position to undertake any such visits. I have had an exchange of correspondence with Charles Foulkes and while he finds the proposition attractive he cannot arrange it at the present time. All along I have felt that it would be preferable for the one man here to go back to the several in Ottawa but have not wished to be tabbed as a tourist. I put it forward at this time because I am confident that 3 days in Ottawa would produce benefits for both sides.

If the verdict of the jury is favourable I will then correspond with Bert [Mac-Kay] concerning dates suitable to all concerned.

Best personal regards,

HERB [MORAN]

CHANGES IN NATIONAL DEFENCE EFFORTS

Following is text of a note circulated by Ismay:

"Recently there has been a tendency for member governments to take important decisions with regard to changes in their defence effort — sometimes after consultation with one of the Supreme Commanders concerned — without prior consultation within the framework of the Council.

2. May I remind my colleagues that Ministers at their meeting in April of this year "found no evidence that the ultimate aims of the Soviet Union has altered, and noted that the military strength of the Soviet Union and its satellites continues to increase. The Council therefore once more agreed upon the need for continuing efforts, vigilance and unity."³ It is clear, therefore, that any changes in the NATO defence effort of individual member nations are of the greatest concern to the alliance as a whole.

3. It might perhaps also be argued that with increasing prosperity in the majority of the member countries, a continuance of defence efforts at the present level is becoming a less onerous burden.

4. But be that as it may, I think that we ought to be quite clear about the procedure which should be adopted when any country has it in mind to alter its defence effort. In this connection, I would remind my colleagues that the Council has, through the machinery used for the annual review, a method which can be used at any time for testing any proposed changes in national defence programmes in relation to the efficiency of NATO forces as a whole, and one by which the views of our principal military advisers can most easily be sought.

5. May we discuss this at our private meeting next Thursday, 29th July? Text ends.

6. You will note that the meeting on July 29 is a private meeting, and that, therefore, no formal decisions, procedural or otherwise, should be taken. Nevertheless, it may occur that Ismay, in summing up at the end of the discussion, will use some such phrase as "then we are all agreed". He could presumably justify such a statement if he were to argue that no new procedure is proposed but that the discussion has served to clarify procedures already in effect. We are not sure to what extent you would wish the Council to affirm explicitly the suggested degree of authority relating to individual national defence programmes. It is, however, not entirely easy to challenge the individual points made in Ismay's note, and accordingly we shall not object to an informal agreement (which the Council might at a subsequent meeting be asked to reaffirm in writing) unless we hear from you prior to Thursday morning.

NATO ANNUAL REVIEW

If Lord Ismay is suggesting that the Council endorse informally the Annual Review procedure as an appropriate method of effecting prior consultation on changes which member countries may propose in their defence efforts, we would raise no repeat no objection provided the practical limitations are recognized. For example, the Annual Review procedure does not always fit in with national timetables nor can it take account of emergencies which may affect national defence programmes.

2. On the other hand, if it is Lord Ismay's intention to establish a procedure which would oblige member governments to submit all changes and revisions in their defence programmes to the Council for prior approval, we should have to reserve our position. Such a proposal would have far-reaching implications touching on the present areas of national responsibility in the defence field. It could not repeat not be properly considered except at a Ministerial Meeting.

3. In any case, we are not repeat not in favour of the Council adopting any formal resolution on this matter at the present time.

4. We should be interested to know whether Lord Ismay's note was occasioned by any particular case (e.g. the Netherlands' recent change in the period of national service or reports of re-organization of the Belgium army)

NATO ANNUAL REVIEW

It had been intended that Ismay's paper would be discussed during the session on July 29. As matters developed, however, there was not time for such a discussion at that meeting, and accordingly it was put off until Monday, August 2. The discussion, preliminary and informal in nature, was perhaps less to the point as a result of the delay, for in the interval Ismay had gone on leave and the chair was taken by Van Vredenburg, who was presumably not completely aware of what Ismay had had in mind in sending around his note.

2. Aside from a few efforts to read Ismay's mind in absentia, the discussion was directed primarily to a search for cases in which some new procedure would be useful. In the course of this search, the SGLO emphasized the distinction between "slippage", i.e. a failure to fulfill accepted goals within the agreed time limit, and a definite decision to lower targets from the levels previously agreed. A further distinction was made between goals for the immediately forthcoming year, which as agreed in the Annual Review process constituted formal commitments on the part of governments, and planning goals for future years which should not be regarded as binding commitments.

3. It was recognized that there is a real procedural gap with regard to definite changes (as opposed to slippage). A country may in December undertake particular programmes for the forthcoming year, and for political or other reasons may decide perhaps in the following June that it wishes to reduce these goals. It is apparently understood that any such reduction should be discussed with the Supreme Commander concerned, but this, of course, affords no parallel to the multilateral assessment of capabilities and requirements which the normal Annual Review process affords. Nevertheless, such changes in accepted commitments have an effect upon the programmes and policies of other NATO countries, and accordingly, it was suggested that there is a need for a procedure to provide at least for notification to other governments in advance of the decision being announced. The French representative, agreeing that such a procedure would be desirable, observed sardonically that this kind of problem could not be settled by procedural methods as there was little that other countries could do if a NATO member chose to dishonour its commitments.

4. The U.K. was in rather a special position during the discussion, as they accepted in principle the thesis outlined in Ismay's note, but were still studying the question, and were not yet prepared to participate in the preparation of a document defining an agreed procedure. It appeared that they have reservations not unlike our own concerning a formal commitment to go through a detailed NATO procedure with regard to changes in defence programming.

5. Van Vredenburg at the request of two or three representatives, agreed that a further study could be carried out by the Secretariat and a paper prepared. Such a paper would attempt to define the problem and to suggest a possible procedure for dealing with it. He proposed that such a paper should be discussed in the Annual Review Committee before examination by the Council.

6. The U.K. objected to this procedure, and asked that such a paper, if it were to be prepared, should be discussed by the Council itself in private session before any decision was taken with regard to its future handling. Since it was clear from the discussion that there was strong sentiment in favour of working out a procedure, we were pleased that the U.K. proposal proved acceptable. We consider that it is the least harmful manner in which to have the matter handled, and will, of course, let you know as soon as the secretariat paper appears.

7. In the meantime, we suggest that the discussion so far has brought out an important point. While many countries apparently believe that there is a procedural gap which should be closed, it appears to be generally accepted that this should apply only in the case of changes which would have a direct bearing upon formally accepted commitments. In other words, it would not apparently apply to "all changes and revisions in their defence programmes" (your paragraph 2) but only those which relate to international NATO commitments. In the second place, it does not appear that people have in mind so much "prior approval" by the council as an opportunity for other countries to be made aware in advance of the proposed changes and to take any related steps which they consider necessary in connection with their own programmes.

8. In conclusion, therefore, while it appears that a definite and binding procedure is going to be proposed, it does not appear probable that there will be any intention of having this procedure apply beyond the region of formally accepted commitments and even then, it would be designed rather more as a procedure of notification than as one involving surrender of sovereignty.

9. With regard to your final point, we have been unable to learn directly the cause of Ismay's initiative. We assume, however, that it is related to the recent Dutch and Belgian action in reducing their period of military service, and the probability that Denmark will take the same step (see our letter No. 2284 of July 29).† Message ends.

DISPOSAL BY EUROPEAN COUNTRIES OF CANADIAN MUTUAL AID EQUIPMENT

We regret that owing to the important policy consideration involved it has not been possible to date to send a formal reply to your telegram. You have however received a copy of National Defence letter dated June 14† suggesting that the Norwegians be told that we have no objection to their retaining Norseman aircraft either as a reserve or for cannibalization. It may be that in the absence of a formal reply from you the Norwegians have used the Norseman aircraft for these purposes. You might let us know whether this is the case.

As you know Canadian policy with respect with the disposal by European countries of the Canadian Mutual Aid equipment is being carefully considered here. This consideration was originally started as a result of the Norwegian query and received added impetus following the suggestion that the United Kingdom might transfer some of its F86 aircraft and equipment supplied by Canada. We hope to be able to consult you before recommending Ministerial approval of a Canadian policy in this respect. In the meantime any comments you may wish to offer would be most welcome.

DISPOSAL BY EUROPEAN COUNTRIES OF CANADIAN MUTUAL AID EQUIPMENT

In view of the very long delay in advising the Norwegians as to the disposal of Norsemen aircraft, we notified them informally on receipt of a copy of National Defence letter of June 14, that there would be no objection to utilizing the surplus aircraft as a reserve or cannibalizing them.

2. With respect to overall Canadian policy regarding the disposal by European countries of Canadian mutual aid equipment, we are glad to submit some brief comments as requested. It would seem to us that one of the good features of our mutual aid programme has been that it is remarkably free of any strings. In fact, the only string which we have attached is the relatively minor one relating to shipping arrangements for mutual aid cargoes. For this reason, we would hesitate to add any too stringent provisions at this stage on the disposal of Canadian mutual aid equipment.

3. It might, however, be a potentially dangerous position if we contracted entirely out of responsibility for what happens to this equipment when European NATO countries no longer require it. We believe, therefore, that it would be desirable to notify recipients that the Canadian Government should be consulted in advance on the disposition of mutual aid equipment. This would provide a safeguard and would enable us where desirable to suggest seeking Standing Group advice. In effect, this is alternative (c) as outlined in your letter of July 29 addressed to the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff.†

CANADIAN MUTUAL AID PLANNING

1. In 1950, at the time the original Canadian Mutual Aid Programme was approved, there existed within NATO large and general deficiencies both of armed forces and of most types of equipment which NATO countries required to equip them. It was then considered that Canada could contribute most effectively to meeting the situation by transferring to other NATO nations as Mutual Aid large existing stocks of armament and ancillary equipment, and by increasing indigenous Canadian capacity for defence production to meet the needs of the alliance.

2. Since the original Mutual Aid programme was approved there have been two developments which have had their effect on the planning and composition of the Canadian Mutual Aid Programme. Not only has Canada undertaken to provide substantial forces for the defence of the NATO area, both in Europe and in North America, but there has also been a steady and marked improvement in the NATO equipment position, in which aid from the United States and Canada has played a significant part. The need to equip Canadian forces for NATO defence has, to a large extent, determined the pattern of Canadian defence production and the types of equipment being produced in Canada. The large and increasing flow of equipment from North America and particularly from the United States under the Mutual Defence Assistance Programme has recently brought about radical reductions in overall NATO deficiencies, so that, where deficiencies still exist, they have become more selective in nature and in most instances, less critical to the military strength of the alliance.

3. Since its inception, the composition of the Canadian Mutual Aid Programme has exhibited the following characteristics:

(a) The emphasis in earlier programmes was on equipment of World War II types which was available originally from existing stocks surplus to the immediate needs of the Canadian Forces or which subsequently could be released by the Canadian services as receipts from production made it possible for them to change over to equipment of U.S. types in accordance with Canadian defence policy. The more recent programmes have contained a significantly larger proportion of materials and equipment produced since World War II, which has become available as existing stocks of older types have been depleted and as Canadian capacity for defence production has increased.

(b) Equipment of newer types included in the Mutual Aid Programme has been included with a view to serving the dual purposes of developing and maintaining productive capacity in Canada to meet the equipment needs of the Canadian forces and of contributing to meet the equipment needs of the forces of Canada's NATO allies, thereby reducing overall NATO deficiencies.

4. With a continued need to maintain well-equipped Canadian forces both at home and abroad, and with an awareness of the changed pattern of deficiencies and production within NATO, studies are now underway in the Departments of Defence Production and National Defence to:

(a) determine the long term equipment deficiencies of the Canadian Armed Services and, in particular, those deficiencies which will exist following mobilization.

(b) determine which of the service needs can advantageously be satisfied by the maintenance of production lines in Canada.

(c) select those lines of production considered desirable to maintain for which service requirements alone will not permit economic operation but which might be made economic if additional orders are placed for Mutual Aid.

5. Future Canadian Mutual Aid proposals will flow from the results of these studies. The basic factors determining the pattern of future Mutual Aid programmes will, therefore, be found in the long-term equipment requirements of the Canadian forces and in the measures taken to satisfy these requirements from Canadian production. Influencing and rounding out the pattern so determined will be other and broader factors which will include the level of forces maintained by Canada's NATO allies, the nature and extent of overall NATO deficiencies of and requirements for defence equipment, and the volume of deliveries of equipment from United States' production and offshore procurement under the U.S. M.D.A.P. and from indigenous production financed by the European NATO nations.

NEXT YEAR'S MUTUAL AID PLANS

I think you may be interested in the attached memorandum reporting on a conversation which an officer of this Department has had with Mr. E.B. Armstrong, the Assistant Deputy Minister responsible for financial questions in the Department of National Defence. While I know that you were prepared some time ago to contemplate the possibility of a reduction in mutual aid if that was necessary in order to increase our Colombo Plan vote, I think you may feel that the cut now envisaged by National Defence is rather drastic. Although it may be premature for us to express any definite views at this stage, you may wish to have this information concerning the lines on which National Defence is now thinking in case this subject comes up in connection with the discussions in Cabinet regarding our contributions to the Colombo Plan and to the various United Nations programmes.⁴

Note du chef de la Direction économique

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], October 25, 1954

PRESENT PLANS FOR NEXT YEAR'S MUTUAL AID PROGRAMME

I spoke with Mr. Elgin Armstrong of National Defence this morning concerning their latest thinking on the possible scale of mutual aid for the fiscal year 1955-56.

2. According to Mr. Armstrong, their plans are not yet definite although they have prepared certain proposals which will shortly be considered by the Committee which "screens" the National Defence estimates. He was aware of our considerable interest in the subject and would expect that, as was the case last year, we would be invited to be represented at the particular meeting of the Screening Committee at which their mutual aid proposals will be examined. He could not say exactly when this will be but undertook to let us know as soon as a date has been settled. He doubted that a final figure for the Mutual Aid Programme would be agreed upon before December.

3. At the present stage, National Defence is apparently contemplating a very substantial cut in the total amount of mutual aid for the coming year. On the assumption of an over-all defence budget of $1.8 billion, allowance is being made for a Mutual Aid Programme of some $175 million. This would represent a reduction of $125 million from the outside figure set for last year in the estimates, or of $105 million from the total of $280 million which was definitely earmarked for mutual aid in last year's inter-departmental discussions. Since it now appears that our actual Mutual Aid Programme during the present year will amount to about $260 million (after allowing for the recent decline in the quantity of certain "direct production" items available for mutual aid and for the short-fall in requirements for infrastructure), it is evident that the proposed figure for next year would be very far below our performances this year. Such a substantial reduction is proposed despite the fact that the over-all defence budget for the coming year is expected to be only slightly less than the amount budgeted for last year ($1.8 billion compared with $1.908 billion) and the further fact that the over-all budget will be larger than the amount which it actually proved possible to spend this year (Expenditures during the current year are expected to come out at about $1.7 billion and cash outlays will be a little less than $1.8 million).

4. In arriving at this tentative figure for mutual aid, National Defence had apparently been influenced by:

⁴ Voir/See Document 214.

(a) the likelihood that not much more than this amount could be used on the equipment which will be available for mutual aid purposes in the light of anticipated Service programmes;

(b) the possibility that, although plans are still somewhat uncertain, U.S. aid to NATO countries may be down next year;

(c) the necessity to provide more resources for continental defence in North America; and

(d) the impression which Mr. Campney had apparently formed that Mr. Pearson would not be unfavourable to a fairly substantial reduction in our Mutual Aid Programme this year.

5. I did not comment on these various considerations beyond noting that no doubt anything which Mr. Pearson might have said regarding a possible reduction in mutual aid was related to the likelihood of increases in certain other expenditures of interest to this Department such as our contribution under the Colombo Plan.

6. Mr. Armstrong did not have all the details of the proposed programme at hand but he said the largest item related to air training and the next most important item had to do with the provision of F-86 aircraft. He remarked that on present plans there was no expectation that CF-100's could be supplied on mutual aid during the coming year.

7. Mr. Armstrong went on to say that a reduction in the programme for 1955-56 would not necessarily imply a reduction in subsequent years since on the basis of present production plans it might well be that a greater variety of military equipment would be available in later years.

Note de l'ambassadeur en Turquie

Memorandum by Ambassador in Turkey

[Ottawa], November 1, 1954

CANADIAN MUTUAL AID PROGRAMME

During my discussions with senior officers in Ottawa, I have expressed the view that we have permitted the Standing Group to take over our mutual aid programme and that the Canadian aspect of it has almost disappeared. Certainly what were originally intended to be merely recommendations of the Standing Group are now being regarded in most countries as decisions. I agree that we should continue to rely on the advice of the Standing Group first because we do not have in Canada the necessary facilities to determine the requirements of the various countries, and secondly, it enables us to avoid the uncomfortable position of having to choose between friends. Therefore, we should continue to seek the recommendations of the Standing Group but we should in my view cease emphasizing in each announcement that the allocations have been made on the recommendation of the Standing

Group and we should discontinue the present practice of telling NATO countries that any representations concerning our programme should be directed to the Standing Group in Washington.

2. Following the public hand-over ceremony of our first jet aircraft to Turkey when extensive publicity was given by the Turkish press to the Canadian Mutual Aid Programme, the French Ambassador in Ankara sent his Counsellor to our Embassy to obtain some information about this new "programme". When Campbell explained that it had been in operation since 1950 and that France itself had been a beneficiary under it, the Counsellor replied "That is a Standing Group programme with which I am familiar, but the press is referring to this programme as 'Canadian'".

3. You will recall that I reported in a recent letter that a head of a foreign mission in Ankara informed me that some of his countrymen would be going to Canada. When I inquired whether the visit was for business reasons, he replied "They are being sent by the Standing Group to participate in its air training programme out there".

4. My experience has been that the Turks learn direct from Washington of allocations long before formal notification reaches us from Ottawa and I am inclined to think that they frequently receive the information ahead of Ottawa. For example, your telegram of September 16 advising me of the allocations of vacancies in our air training scheme contained information which had been given to me in Ankara about one month earlier. Another example was the offer of our 55 additional jet aircraft. When I approached the Foreign Office official on the matter, he told me that I could send an immediate acceptance since the Turks had been informed some weeks previously that such an allocation had been made to them and that the Turkish Cabinet had already given consideration to and reached a decision on the matter. This is fairly clear evidence that the offers through Canadian channels have been reduced to a mere formality.

5. My discussions on this subject with General Foulkes and Messrs. Drury, Bryce and MacKay, have been quite full and, therefore, I need not repeat in this memorandum all my arguments and illustrations. It is, however, a question to which some attention might be directed to see if we cannot recover for Canada the credit which it is not now receiving for the extensive aid which it is giving to European NATO countries.

CANADIAN MUTUAL AID PROGRAMME — F.86 AIRFRAMES SUPPLIED
TO THE UNITED KINGDOM

During the recent visit of the Chairman of the Chiefs of Staff to Paris he sent a signal to the Joint Staff here enquiring about the status of the projected exchange of F.86's now held by the RAF for Hawker-Hunters to be financed out of United States mutual security funds. General Foulkes said that he had been under the impression that the whole proposal had been cancelled. Admiral deWolfe ascertained that the exchange had not been abandoned and so informed General Foulkes on October 21. However, he thought — and we agreed — that it would be useful if we were to try to find out a little more about how this deal stood through enquiries at the Foreign Operations Administration. Accordingly, yesterday afternoon we called on John Ohly, Deputy Director for programme and planning. Ohly confirmed that the exchange was still on the cards and indeed stressed that it was hoped by all the interested United States agencies that it could quickly be consummated. However, he told us that fairly serious difficulties had developed over the last few months which had delayed the transfer.

2. Most of the questions that had been at issue between the United States and the United Kingdom authorities concerned significant details of the exact bargain to be struck. FOA, he said, wished to have a clear idea of what front-line fighter strength in the RAF would be created by the proposed allocation of mutual security funds to finance the acquisition of Hawker-Hunters. The RAF was insisting on what seemed to the United States authorities to be a very high ratio of planes in reserve. Moreover, the price now being quoted for each individual Hawker-Hunter had also risen substantially since the deal was first contemplated, so that the proposed allocation of mutual security funds would now buy fewer planes than had been expected. For these two reasons it seemed that the transaction would not be likely to produce so much front-line strength as had been hoped. The United States authorities wished to clear up this uncertainty before clinching the deal. They also wished to know more exactly how many F.86's they would be receiving in return. They were arguing that, since the F.86's now held by the United Kingdom had been subject to considerable use, the exchange should not be on a one-for-one basis but should result in the United States receiving a somewhat larger number of F.86's than the number of Hawker-Hunters that the United Kingdom would be getting. Haggling of this kind could hardly be avoided, Ohly explained, in view of the many existing United States commitments to supply fighters to other European countries.

3. In addition to the bargaining that was going on between the United States and the United Kingdom authorities, Ohly admitted that the transfer had also been delayed because Mr. Stassen now felt that he should seek some informal but explicit approval of it from a few congressional leaders. What was intended had never been explained to Congressional Committees, and Mr. Stassen was now convinced that it would be necessary to take Congress more fully into his confidence.

4. In spite of the difficulties that had arisen over recent months, Ohly said that he still believed the deal would go through. Both FOA and the Department of Defence realized that plans for modernizing the RAF were in considerable measure dependent on the proposed transfer and would make every effort to see that it was successfully completed.

5. You will appreciate that this message may be of some interest to the Department of Defence Production as well as to the Department of National Defence.

DOCUMENT NO. D13-54

Ottawa, November 8, 1954

SECRET

THE CANADIAN MUTUAL AID PROGRAMME, 1954-55
REVISED ESTIMATE OF EXPENDITURES

1. Cabinet Defence Committee approval was given on December 2, 1953, to an appropriation of $300 million for the 1954-55 Canadian Mutual Aid Programme, on the understanding that the programme would be initially planned for an expenditure of $280 million in the light of the possibility that the balance might be needed by the Canadian Forces. It has now become apparent that the part of the Mutual Aid appropriation in excess of the $280 million will not be required by the Services.

2. Following a review of the original $280 million programme, taking into account actual expenditures in 1953-54, changes in production forecasts, equipment availabilities, etc., and, in order to approach the original figure, the following additional items have been considered for inclusion in the programme.

(a) Approved Additions to Programme

Since the preparation of the original programme outline, the following items have been approved for inclusion and taken into account in the above revision of the 1954-55 programme, for allocation through the appropriate NATO agency.

Ammunition Components

Because of technical difficulties in filling, ammunition schedules have been set back, with the result that the accumulation of certain Shell empties has caused a serious storage problem. The transfer of these components as Mutual Aid will relieve the storage problem and bring the scheduled flow of empties to the filling plant closer to the normal requirement. The items which will be available prior to March 31, 1955, at an estimated cost of $4,290,800 are attached at Appendix "B".† The transfer of these components under the category of "direct production", will correct the present position of imbalance between the production of components and filled rounds.

One Mile Sets

On the recommendation of the Department of Defence Production additional orders have been placed for One Mile Sets (C/PRC-26) to maintain production beyond November 15, 1954. As there is a possibility that orders for this set may be forthcoming from the United States and as the sets can be considered a useful contribution to assist in filling NATO equipment deficiencies, it was considered desirable that the plant be retained in production until March 31, 1955 at the rate of 25 sets per day. The estimated cost of this addition is as follows:

No. of Sets to March 31/55	2,250 with Spares, etc.
Cost including Test equipment, freight to seaboard, packaging, etc.	$2,300,000.

The above equipments are in addition to 9,000 already allocated.

(b) Further Additions to Programme

The Services have advised that additional equipment acquired prior to March 31, 1955, may be offered as follows:

	Number	Amount
		$
Army
Cartridges, 20mm Oerlikon	600,212	$ 952,664
Air Force
Adaptors Cluster M24A @ $8.	3,600	30,240
Ammunition 20mm HEI HISPANO @ $1.50	750,000	1,181,250
Rds. Ammunition .303 in AP "W" @ .50/1,000	2,000,000	105,000
Rds. Ammunition 20mm SAP HISPANO @ $1.50	1,000,000	1,575,000
Navy
4" Mk 19 twin hand operated mountings & guns	3	220,500
	TOTAL	$ 4,064,654

It is recommended, therefore, that these additional items calling for expenditure only in the current fiscal year be included in the 1954-55 Mutual Aid Programme.

3. The above review and additions will result in a revised programme as follows:

		Original	Estimated Expenditure	Revised
Direct Production Items		31,475,000		$25,000,000
NATO Aircrew Training		59,000,000		57,000,000
Contributions—NATO Budgets	1,000,000		1,000,000
Common Infrastructure	18,000,000	19,000,000	10,000,000	11,000,000
Transfers of equipment acquired prior to March 31, 1950
Army	32,200,000		35,000,000
Navy	1,420,000		500,000
Air	1,380,000	35,000,000	3,000,000	38,500,000
Transfers of equipment acquired after March 31, 1950
Army	25,325,000		24,000,000
Navy	15,311,000		11,000,000
Air	91,967,000	132,603,000	93,500,000	128,500,000
		277,078,000		260,000,000

Details of the above revisions are attached at Appendix "A"

4. Offering of equipment acquired prior to March 31, 1950, for transfer during 1955-56

The experience of the past several years indicates that there is much advantage in Canada making our offerings known as early as possible, to permit of the programme being examined by the Standing Group and possible recipients. In addition, with the increase in deliveries of equipment under the U.S. Mutual Defence Assistance Programme and European production generally, it is most likely that it will gradually become increasingly difficult to create interest in taking equipment of older types and that European NATO countries will become increasingly selective in their bidding for equipment offered under the Canadian programmes.

It is therefore recommended that Canada offer in 1954-55 through the Standing Group the equipment detailed in the attached appendix "C", with the proviso that its release in 1955-56 was subject to the availability of funds and the requirements of the Canadian Services.⁵

Appendix A

EXPLANATION OF REVISIONS IN PROGRAMME

(a) Direct Production

Delays in production of several items including 17 pdr APDS ammunition and 155 mm Howitzers, reductions in quantities of certain defence chemicals and the stretch out of production of R-1340 Wasp Engines will result in a noticeable drop in estimated expenditures in 1954-55, with a resulting carry-over to 1955-56 on approved production items totalling approximately $14 million. Present production schedules will, except for small quantities of spares, result in the completion of the major programmes for Radar Sets A.A. No. 4 MK 6/2 and One Mile Sets (CPRC 26). No additional offerings of these equipments are contemplated.

(b) NATO Air Crew Training

A revised basis of costing this programme would have produced an estimated expenditure of $65,700,000 for the year but this has been largely offset by the dropping of certain proposed capital expenditures and some lag in pupil intake. The continuation of the NATO Air Crew Training programme has been approved to 1957-58.

(c) NATO Budgets and Common Infrastructure

Recent estimates by the NATO Secretariat indicate a substantial reduction in expenditures from their earlier forecasts.

(d) Transfers from Service Stocks

In addition to the items detailed in the original programme for 1954-55, the following items have been added and offered:

	No.	Value
Army
Equipments, Quad 20 mm A.A. CMK 1	26	$ 659,555
Equipments, B.L. 9.2 in. Gun and F.C. Equipment	8	2,100,000
Shells, B.L. 9.2 in.	3278	978,712
Equipments, B.L. 7.5 in. Gun and F.C. Equipment	3	787,500
Shells, B.L. 7.5 in.	1025	148,922	4,674,689
Air Force
Flying Suits	Various		425,000
			$5,099,689

Advice from the Standing Group on bids received for the new offerings in 1954-55 indicates that there has been a good response with respect to the majority of types of equipment offered. The revised estimate takes into account the additions referred to in the preceding paragraph, Standing Group bids on new offers and adjustments resulting from the carryover from the 1953-54 programme, etc.

(e) Transfers from Current Production for the Services

Advice of bids from Standing Group indicates that all new offerings are overbid. The increase from the earlier estimate is mainly due to a large carryover to 1954-55 in the spares support for the 370 F86's transferred to the United Kingdom and the provision of spares support for the F86's allocated to Turkey and Greece. However, these increases have been partially offset by a reduction in the valuation placed on J47 Jet Engines.

MUTUAL AID: TRAINING OF GERMAN AIRCREW IN CANADA

The entry of the German Federal Republic into NATO, once the relative North Atlantic Treaty and Brussels Treaty Protocols have been ratified, is almost certain to raise sooner or later the question of admitting German airmen to the NATO air training scheme in Canada.

2. As you will recall, this question was touched on briefly in Cabinet in the discussion on your submission prior to the recent Ministerial Meeting of the North Atlantic Council in Paris. At that time the view was expressed that it would be best, because of the state of opinion in Canada about Germany and because of the problems that would be created by an additional language group in the Training Programme, to discourage any proposal to train German aircrew in Canada as part of the Mutual Aid Programme "at this time."⁶ I understand that the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, is also of a similar view. He has on several recent occasions expressed privately his fear that we might risk trouble and possible indignation in Canada if some German airman training here chanced to meet a relative of one of the Canadian prisoners shot by General Kurt Meyer in the last war.⁷

3. The question of training German pilots in Canada was raised in a different context two years ago as the result of informal inquiries by the Chief of German Air Force Planning. At that time we concluded that no consideration should be given to training Germans in Canada unless and until a formal request was received through NATO-EDC channels. At the same time, however, General Foulkes expressed objections, on grounds of both practicability and desirability, to such a proposal no matter how the approach was made. Following is an extract from a letter of October 29 from General Foulkes to the Under-Secretary on this subject:

"From the standpoint of practicability, it is not considered that Canada could provide training facilities in any of the Services unless the students can speak English.

Apart from the above, from the desirability aspect, it is considered there is a large morale factor. If German candidates were accepted at various training schools and colleges, there is always the probability that they might be under instruction with Canadian officers who have lost members of their immediate family during World Wars I and II, or have had other first-hand experiences with Nazi attitudes during World War II, which may have left them with strong prejudices. Although this factor is hard to assess, the recent strong feeling against mitigation of the sentence of Kurt Meyer must be taken as an indication that it is questionable whether the old enmities can be forgotten as quickly as present realistic interests would dictate. It would be most unfortunate if an incident did occur involving German and Canadian students which might prove politically embarrassing to Canada and tend to retard, rather than foster, the growth of mutual confidence necessary between these German forces and the other NATO countries."

4. Circumstances have changed since then, however, and I submit that we should now bear in mind in considering this problem that, once Germany is a full member of NATO, it will be extremely difficult to find any justification for treating her on any basis different from that on which we treat the other NATO countries.⁸ I assume that we shall at least wish to appear to treat Germany without discrimination. Unless we change our Mutual Aid procedure, therefore, we shall have to continue to offer, through the Standing Group, the available arms and equipment and the vacancies in our air training programme to all the NATO countries who wish to bid for them, and the Standing Group will be free to recommend allocation to any NATO country, including Germany. Of course the Canadian Government will still be free to accept, reject or modify the Standing Group's recommendations, but if the Government does reject or modify them with respect to allocations to Germany, it will be for the first time.

5. It might be possible to reach some secret understanding with the Standing Group that German aircrew should be trained elsewhere than in Canada and that allocations of vacancies in the Canadian programme would therefore not require to be given to Germany. Whether any such understanding could be kept secret is another matter, and if it were to leak out it might be extremely difficult to justify. It would be hard to explain why the presence of German airmen in Canada would cause greater indignation here than our support for German membership in NATO, or how it is more likely to cause incidents than the presence of Canadian servicemen and their dependents in Germany. As for the alleged problem of an additional language group, it seems unlikely that the prospective German candidates, whose working knowledge of English is likely to be relatively good, would cause any more trouble in this regard than, say, the Norwegians or the Dutch; and they would certainly cause less trouble than the Turks, Portuguese and Italians.

6. It could also be argued that Canada would offer particularly favourable opportunities for bringing members of the future German forces into contact with people and ideas in Canada which would broaden their horizon and help to ensure that those we are rearming will be our friends.

7. I have no specific recommendation to make at present but thought I should bring these considerations to your attention in case there is further discussion of this problem between now and the time, a few months hence, when the Government may need to come to some decision on it.⁹

J. L[ÉGER]

⁹ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

If we can avoid receiving Germans for NATO training, we should do so, but not in a way which discriminated against them. The Germans, rightly, will refuse to be treated as second-class members of NATO. The longer the question of German air training in Canada can be postponed, the better. Meanwhile, we should be careful to say or do nothing which would disturb either Canadian or German public opinion. L.B. P[earson]

[Ottawa], November 10, 1954

101ST MEETING OF CABINET DEFENCE COMMITTEE
FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 1954

Agenda Item 3 — Canadian Mutual Aid Planning (Document D12-54)

The memorandum before Defence Cabinet Committee which has been prepared in the Department of National Defence attempts to establish criteria upon which future Canadian Mutual Aid Programmes are to be based. Future proposals for mutual aid would reflect primarily the need to maintain certain lines of production in Canada considered desirable to meet the requirements of the Canadian Services. "Influencing and rounding out", this pattern would be, among other things, "the nature and extent of overall NATO deficiencies and the requirements (of other NATO countries) for defence equipment."

It is difficult to argue as to the appropriateness of the criteria suggested. There is moreover little doubt that, as the memorandum suggests, NATO equipment deficiencies have become "more selective in nature and in most instances less critical to the military strength of the alliance". In these circumstances, and bearing in mind among other things that future U.S. military aid programmes for Europe are likely to be reduced substantially from their present level (the level of the Canadian programme has in the past been determined to a large extent by the size of the U.S. programme) it seems that some further reduction in the level of Canadian military assistance might be appropriate.

However, the memorandum does seem to have one significant shortcoming. It does not seem to recognize that the size of the Canadian Mutual Aid Programme has in the past been influenced very substantially by broad political considerations having to do with our status within NATO. Canada has recognized a need to provide this special type of evidence of our willingness to do our part in strengthening European defence forces. In the light of our relatively favourable economic position (and, incidentally, in the absence of compulsory military service in Canada), it has been considered by our partners that even without resort to any rigid "burden-sharing" concept, it would not be unreasonable to expect a considerable amount of assistance from Canada.

Since we were not prepared to give "economic aid", our allies reconciled themselves to the acceptance of assistance in the form of military equipment and training facilities under mutual aid. It would seem appropriate for our future programmes also to take account of these considerations. Certainly if, as a result of limiting ourselves to the criteria contained in the memorandum which will be before the Committee (with the different emphasis given to the various criteria in that paper), the level of future Canadian assistance were to be substantially reduced we would be exposing ourselves to serious criticism within NATO and our standing in the alliance might suffer. If the amount of equipment (and training) which we found it advantageous to supply did not add up to a respectable total programme, the pressure on us to provide the balance of what might be considered an adequate programme in the form of "economic aid" might be revived, despite the change in atmosphere over the past few years.

In summary then, it would appear reasonable for Cabinet Defence Committee to accept as a basis for future Canadian Mutual Aid planning the paper submitted by the Minister of National Defence. In accepting this paper, however, the Committee may wish to recognize the political considerations which have in the past influenced the level of the Canadian programme and the unfortunate effects which might follow from a severe cut from its present level. It might also be noted that the political consequences of any significant reduction in mutual aid might be somewhat mitigated if at the same time we were increasing our assistance to other countries of the free world under the Colombo Plan or other arrangements.

CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, November 12, 1954

CANADIAN MUTUAL AID PROGRAMME

As you know, when our Ambassador in Turkey, Mr. H.O. Moran, was in Ottawa recently, he suggested that our apparent reliance on the Standing Group (and, in the case of the non end-item aid, the Secretary-General) for recommending allocations of equipment offered by Canada as mutual aid has resulted in serious misconceptions abroad as to the character of the Canadian Programme. What were originally intended to be merely recommendations of the Standing Group are now being regarded in most countries as decisions and the Standing Group, rather than Canada, is apparently being given a good deal of credit for such equipment as is supplied under these arrangements. This is undoubtedly due in large measure to the fact that word of the allocations recommended usually reaches the proposed recipients through the Standing Group a considerable time before any notification is received from Canada. While there are good arguments for continuing to seek the advice of the Standing Group, Mr. Moran believes that we should no longer place so much emphasis in each announcement on the fact that allocations have been made on the recommendation of the Standing Group; nor should we continue the present practice of telling NATO countries that any representations concerning the Canadian programme should only be directed to the Standing Group in Washington.

I think you will agree that, bearing in mind the size of the Canadian Programme, our present basic procedures are reasonably satisfactory. Nevertheless, I believe that Mr. Moran has put forward some convincing arguments for a modification of the present arrangements — a modification which would insure that recipient countries would be left in no doubt that our mutual aid programme was a Canadian programme and that Canada was free to accept, reject or alter recommendations for the allocation of Canadian mutual aid received from the Standing Group. With this in mind, the following two alternative proposals might be considered:

1. An offer of equipment through the Standing Group could be accompanied by a statement presented by the Canadian Military Representative emphasizing that the Standing Group was being asked to suggest to the Canadian Government an allocation of the equipment offered in the light of bids received from potential recipients. Steps could also be taken to ensure that allocation recommendations by the Standing Group would, in the future, be communicated only to Canadian authorities for their consideration and would not be conveyed even informally by the Standing Group to prospective recipients. The decision of the Canadian Government regarding the allocation of the equipment which was being made available would take into account the Standing Group's recommendations and would result in formal offers being made by Canada to European NATO countries. The Standing Group would then be advised of the decision taken.

2. All prospective recipients could be notified (possibly through diplomatic channels) of offers of Canadian Mutual Aid equipment. NATO countries interested in obtaining the equipment offered would be requested to indicate to the Standing Group their requirements. The Standing Group would in turn notify the Canadian authorities directly of their recommendations. A formal offer of the equipment would then be made to prospective recipients by the Canadian Government, taking into account the Standing Group's recommendations and the Standing Group would be advised.

The above suggestions represent only two of the several possible methods of meeting the problems raised by Mr. Moran. Both have shortcomings, although they involve no radical departure from our present basic policies. I should be grateful to receive your comments on this problem in due course.

III. CANADIAN MUTUAL AID PLANNING

8. The Minister of National Defence said that at the time the original mutual aid programme had been approved, there had existed general deficiencies both of armed forces and of most types of equipment which NATO countries needed. It had then been considered that Canada could contribute most effectively to meeting this situation by transferring to other NATO nations large existing stocks of equipment and by increasing Canadian capacity for defence production. Since the original programme had been approved, not only had Canada provided substantial forces for the defence of the NATO area but there had also been a marked improvement in the NATO equipment position, in which aid from the United States and Canada had played an important part. The need to equip Canadian forces for NATO defence had to a large degree determined the Canadian pattern of defence production and the types of equipment produced in Canada. The large flow of equipment from North America had radically reduced overall NATO deficiencies so that where deficiencies still existed, they had become more selective in nature, and in most instances less critical to the military strength of the Allies.

The Canadian mutual aid programme had initially consisted largely of Second World War equipment available from existing stocks or of equipment released by Canadian services as receipts from new production made it possible to change over to equipment of North American types. More recently, mutual aid programmes had contained a significantly larger proportion of materials produced since the Second World War. The equipment of newer types had been included in the programmes with a view to developing Canadian productive capacity and contributing to the needs of Canada's NATO allies. Against the background of the continued need to maintain well-equipped Canadian forces, and of the changed pattern of deficiencies and production within NATO, studies were now under way to determine the long-term deficiencies of the Canadian Armed Forces, and in particular those deficiencies which would exist following mobilization, to determine which of the service needs could be satisfied advantageously by the maintenance of production lines in Canada, and to select those lines of production considered desirable to maintain, of which service requirements alone would not permit economic operation but which might be made economic if there were additional orders for mutual aid. Future proposals would flow from the results of these studies. The basic factors determining such programmes would be found in the requirements of the Canadian forces themselves, and in the measures taken to satisfy them from Canadian production. The pattern would also be affected by the level of forces to be maintained within NATO, the overall deficiencies of NATO nations, the volume of U.S. aid and indigenous production financed by European NATO nations themselves.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, September 2, 1954, Cabinet Defence Committee Document D12-54).

9. In the course of discussion the following points emerged:

(a) There was an added criterion of a political nature governing Canada's mutual aid policy. This was found in the general desire to cooperate in building up the strength of NATO forces and mutual aid would remain to some extent as part of the burden-sharing exercise adopted by all NATO nations.

(b) SHAPE had asked the Chiefs of Staff if Canada were in a position to assist in the training of pilots for the West German air force contribution to NATO. For a variety of reasons it would be desirable for Canada not to undertake this form of assistance. It might be suggested to the Standing Group that it would be more logical for Canada to continue training French pilots and that the United States might undertake to look after the German needs since it was likely that there were more people of German extraction there than in Canada. In any event, it was necessary to find a respectable reason for not including in Canada's mutual aid programme the training of pilots for the German Air Force.

10. The Committee:

(a) noted with approval the report of the Minister of National Defence regarding Canadian Mutual Aid planning and the factors likely to determine such programmes in the future; and

(b) agreed that appropriate but tactful steps be taken to avoid vacancies in the aircrew training programme being allotted to students from the flying components of the Federal German Republic's NATO forces.

CONFIDENTIAL

MUTUAL AID FOR TURKEY — FERRYING OF F-86 AIRCRAFT, PAYMENT OF OCEAN SHIPPING CHARGES AND COST OF LANGUAGE INSTRUCTION

1. When the Canadian Ambassador to Turkey was in Ottawa recently, he advanced a powerful plea for taking into account the precarious financial circumstances of Turkey and making, as a consequence, the terms of our Mutual Aid to that country more generous.

2. In his view, Turkey is chronically on the verge of bankruptcy and is financing its military and civilian effort on a hand-to-mouth basis. At the same time, Turkey represents the largest military machine in Europe wholly wedded to the support of the Western philosophy. Achieving this has led the Turks into difficulties and they now find themselves with practically no reserves of foreign exchange and inadequate foreign income.

3. In the Ambassador's opinion, Canada should recognize the outstanding Turkish military effort and perhaps be more liberal with her than other European allies.

4. Specifically, he has suggested that as a token of goodwill, Canada should pay the full cost of providing instruction in English for Turkish students coming out for air training under the Mutual Aid scheme. There are very few people in Turkey who can speak English and there are no schools apparently to which these young men can be sent to learn English before coming to Canada. Mr. Moran suggests that Turkey is in a special position in this regard. At the present time, we are providing board and lodging for these Turkish students but have suggested that the cost of instructors should be found from Turkish resources. The cost of these instructors, depending on the number of trainees at any one time, is roughly estimated as follows:

Trainees at any Time	Estimated Amount
25	$15,000 to $20,000
50	$25,000 to $30,000
100	$50,000 to $55,000

The bearing of this cost by Canada would neither cure the Turkish foreign exchange problems nor present grave difficulties for us. It would be a token of goodwill which might have some advantages for Turkey, but would probably lead to a suggestion by other countries that we do the same for them, and unless the Air Force is to establish a large school for teaching English, would get us in bad odour with those of our allies we refused.

5. Further, Mr. Moran has suggested that because of Turkish foreign exchange difficulties, we should assume the cost of ocean freight of Mutual Aid as far as a Turkish port. When it was pointed out that this would immediately be followed by urgent pleas for similar treatment by Greece, Portugal, France and possible the Netherlands, he suggested that an exception could be made for Turkey as an underdeveloped country. I would think that perhaps the Greeks and the Portuguese might lay claim to a similar state of underdevelopment if it meant that we would pay the cost of ocean freight of Mutual Aid to their countries. It should be noted, however, that if Canada were to assume the cost of ocean freight, a great many of the problem of the Maritime Commission in endeavouring to secure use of Canadian bottoms for carrying this cargo would disappear. On the other hand, it has been a general feeling all along in respect of Mutual Aid that requests for Mutual Aid assistance from Canada would probably tend to be better founded and more realistic if the recipient countries had to make some kind of sacrifice in order to get it. This is perhaps particularly true in the case of Turkey, in respect of which it has been suggested in some quarters that she is endeavouring to maintain too large a military apparatus for her resources to be able to support.

6. A further suggestion was that Canada should undertake to ferry Mutual Aid aircraft from the United Kingdom to Turkey. It appears that the Turks have difficulty in finding the money to finance this operation, but even more serious, have no pilots or at least very few, capable of performing this operation. If the latter is true, then I would think a special case could be made. This would not be likely to lead to similar assistance to countries other than Greece, although it is understood the Greeks themselves have sufficient pilots in the Greek Air Force to carry out the flights.

7. I would recommend that we not assume the additional cost of instructors in English of Turkish pilots, nor the ocean freight of Mutual Aid to Turkey, but that we be prepared to ferry F-86 aircraft from the United Kingdom to a Turkish delivery point.¹⁰

A report on the 1954 Annual Review of NATO countries' defence programmes will be submitted to the Ministerial Meeting of the North Atlantic Council now scheduled to be held in Paris commencing December 17. This report will contain a general survey of NATO's present position, a series of studies on the most important problems of concern to NATO as a whole, and a chapter on each member country.

2. The draft Country Chapter on Canada is submitted herewith. It is to have three annexes. Annex I contains supplementary statistical tables and is not attached to this memorandum. Annex II, which is attached, contains a list of military recommendations (see paragraph 4 below). Annex III is to contain whatever Canadian comments it is desired to make on the Country Chapter and on the recommendations (see paragraph 6 below).

3. The draft Country Chapter on Canada, like those on the other countries, was prepared by the NATO Secretariat (or International Staff) with the assistance of certain designated delegations, and taking into account the comments of the NATO Supreme Commanders. In the case of Canada, the designated delegations were those of the United States, the United Kingdom and France, which formed a panel to examine the Canadian reply to the Annual Review questionnaire. (The Canadian Delegation itself was a member of the panels for Belgium and Denmark.) The Annual Review Committee then examined and revised the Chapter and agreed to transmit it to the Council. During this process the Canadian Delegation was able to obtain a considerable number of amendments designed to present our position more fairly and accurately.

The Panel on the Economic Aspects of Defence agreed on November 19, 1954 that Canada would pay for training Turkish pilots in English and for ferrying F-86's from the United Kingdom to Turkey. It refused to have Canada assume the cost of ocean freight shipments of mutual aid to Turkey.

4. The conclusions and recommendations in Part IV of the Chapter remain the responsibility of the NATO Secretariat, who drafted them, and the military recommendations in Annex II likewise remain the responsibility of the NATO Supreme Commanders and the Standing Group. The Annual Review Committee has explicitly recognized this fact in the introductions to all the Country Chapters. These conclusions and recommendations do not commit member governments in any way and they will not come up for adoption or formal approval by the North Atlantic Council. Nevertheless, member governments are asked to give these recommendations serious consideration, to comment on them if desired in Annex III of Country Chapters, and to indicate if possible by the time of the Ministerial Meeting which of them could be accepted.

5. The Panel on the Economic Aspects of Defence Questions considers that the Canadian Country Chapter (with Annexes I and II) is a reasonably satisfactory document, bearing in mind the process whereby it was produced.

6. The Panel has approved a draft of Annex III (Canadian Comments), which is attached. It comprises comments on the military sections of the NATO Secretariat's conclusions and recommendations, and indicates acceptance by Canada of some of the military recommendations listed in Annex II. The Panel recommends that these comments, which are in elaboration of existing Canadian policy and do not involve further commitments, be transmitted to the NATO Secretariat for attachment to the Canadian Country Chapter. The Panel considers that no comments on the remaining sections of the NATO Secretariat's conclusions and recommendations are required.

7. The Panel gave special consideration to the International Staff's recommendation "That the Canadian authorities should:

(1) continue mutual aid programmes, as of great importance to NATO. In this respect it is noted with satisfaction that the Canadian Government is concentrating on the delivery of modern equipment, with provision for the supply of spare parts as appropriate; . . ."

8. The Panel was of the opinion that a comment on this recommendation should not be included in Annex III. Rather, the Panel suggests that a statement reviewing our Mutual Aid programme up to date and saying what is possible about future mutual aid policy be made by one of the Ministers at the forthcoming Ministerial Meeting. A draft statement will be prepared and submitted for ministerial approval in due course.

ANNUAL REVIEW COMMITTEE
DRAFT COUNTRY REPORT ON CANADA*Introduction*

This report on Canada has been prepared by the international staff, who have received assistance from the delegations of France, United Kingdom, United States. The report as a whole has been examined by the Annual Review Committee, who have agreed to submit it to the Council. The recommendations at its close, though discussed along with the remainder of the report by the Annual Review Committee, remain the responsibility of the international staff. Comments of the Canadian (and other) delegation(s) on this report and its annexes are at Annex III.

I. MILITARY CONSIDERATIONS

Main Trend

At the end of 1954 the Canadian contribution to NATO in M and D-Day forces will consist of an infantry brigade group in Europe, a naval force of 1 light carrier, 23 escorts, 5 minesweepers and 48 maritime aircraft, and an air force in Europe of 246 modern interceptor day fighters. These forces are substantially in conformity with the firm force goals established in the 1953 Annual Review, except for a temporary shortfall of some fifty aircraft due to deliveries of aircraft by Canada to other NATO countries.

2. The general situation forecast for the end of 1954 shows an improvement over that existing at the end of 1953. Canada has not been able to accept all the recommendations made to her last year, particularly when these called for an increase in the size of the contribution to SACEUR and SACLANT over and above that already planned. However, it is the policy of the Canadian Government to maintain and improve upon the quality of their forces by providing them with modern types of equipment.

3. Future plans for the three Services entail no marked difference from the end of 1954 goals and are generally in accordance with the goals set in the 1953 Annual Review. Of some general importance is the question whether Canada will be able to make an all weather fighter contribution to SACEUR's air forces, the outcome of which is, in part, bound up with plans for the air defence of the Canada/US region. Although not discussed in this review, it should be borne in mind that the Canadian commitments for the defence of the Canada/US region are a matter of major concern to the Canadian Government and are essential to the fulfilling of Canada's undertakings to NATO.

Army

4. The firm force goals for 1954 of one infantry brigade group in Europe at M-Day, increasing to a full division as soon as possible after M Plus 30, will be met. As last year, the availability of the 2/3 division is subject to the prior release of the Canadian forces in Korea. The 2/3 division is an M-Day force in Canada, phased in Europe between M plus 30 and M plus 90, depending on the availability of shipping. Assurance has been given that every effort will be made to ensure the most expeditious transit possible. In this connection, it is noted that arrangements are being made for the stockpiling in the United Kingdom of the heavy equipment for the division, so that only personnel and certain light equipment will have to be shipped after D-Day. However, although this matter is being pressed, the completion of the stockpiling programme will take some time.

5. There is no change in the Canadian plans in respect of army forces for NATO during the period 1955-57. As long as there are Canadian forces in Korea, there will be an implied commitment for Canada to reinforce them when and if necessary. This places a limitation on Canadian ability to accept a firm commitment as to the time at which the remainder of the division earmarked for SACEUR can be despatched to Europe.

6. In the 1953 Annual Review concern was expressed at the lack of combat and logistic support for the brigade group in Germany and also for the complete division when it was scheduled to arrive in Europe. It was recommended that Canada, in consultation with the United Kingdom and SHAPE, should explore means of improving the situation. Negotiations with the United Kingdom have now been completed and the present Canadian plan envisages only the provision of non-divisional Canadian support units totalling about 2,500 men at the same time as the balance of the Canadian division to provide support of a purely Canadian nature. This is an improvement, but since 2,500 men are considerably less than the supporting troops required in a divisional slice at army level and as the British forces themselves lack adequate support, even after M plus 30, the position remains unsatisfactory both as regards M-Day support for the Canadian brigade and later for the division. The whole position therefore calls for further active consideration on how the necessary support forces are to be provided. It is satisfactory to note on the other hand, that arrangements are well under way for the stockpiling of operational reserves in Europe for both the brigade now in Germany and the whole division.

7. Reserve forces are now being reorganized but detailed information is not yet available. The recent formation of a Canadian Army Regular Reserve, in order to enable rapid expansion of the active forces in an emergency, forms a part of this reorganization. The Canadian plans envisage the formation of a second reserve division which will eventually be earmarked for SACEUR, but it is not intended to raise this division until after M-Day. Its equipment will be made available from holdings in Canada.

Navy

8. The firm goals for naval forces for end 1954 will be met except for 2 cruisers which are to be de-commissioned on D-Day and have therefore been dropped from the force plans. In accordance with the agreed force goals for 1954 there will be an improvement in time-phasing of escort vessels.

9. The Canadian authorities have not found it possible to accept recommendations for further improvements, over and above those now planned, in the number and time-phasing of escort vessels and for the provision of more maritime aircraft. They are, however, still studying this matter and have already indicated that as a result of the de-commissioning of the 2 cruisers it may be possible to improve the time-phasing of some escort vessels from 1956 onwards. Present plans for the period 1955-1958, however maintain the 1954 time-phasing unchanged.

10. 48 maritime patrol aircraft will be available on D-Day, during the period under review. It is satisfactory to note that Canada has placed orders for a prototype of a new long-range maritime patrol aircraft which it is hoped will result in increased effectiveness in these forces from 1957 onwards. In the meantime, Canada will purchase a number of P2V-7 (Neptune) aircraft from the United States and will make limited modifications to some of the Lancasters which remain in use beyond 1956.

11. As in 1953, there is a shortage of submarines for anti-submarine training. It is noted that in conformity with the recommendation made in the 1953 Annual Review, Canada has concluded negotiations with the appropriate British authorities and that, by summer 1955, the anti-submarine training facilities will be adequate.

Air Force

12. There will be a shortfall of 54 aircraft against the firm force goal for end 1954 of 300 interceptor day fighter aircraft due to deliveries made to Greece and Turkey under Canadian Mutual Aid. The 246 aircraft, all of which are stationed in Europe represent an increase of 54 over the 1953 figure and are of a type which will be fully combat effective throughout the period under review. On present plans, the force of 300 IDF, which will be achieved by August, 1955, will be maintained without change through 1958.

13. The Canadian Government has not found it possible to accept the earlier recommendation for the stationing of three all weather fighter squadrons in Europe from 1956 onwards. They are, however, giving serious consideration to the present alternative suggestion that all weather fighters should be substituted for some of the interceptor day fighter units at present assigned in view of the serious shortage of all weather fighters in Europe.

14. The logistic support of the Canadian Air Forces on the continent of Europe is being substantially improved. Except for aircraft, Canada plans to build up by the end of 1954 the majority of the war reserve stocks required to support 90 days of war operation based on approved rates.

15. As regards AC&W it is planned to provide a number of units on the continent of Europe during 1956. However, as a result of procurement of an improved type of radar at an earlier date than originally anticipated, Canada hopes to be able to provide a ground control intercept complex by the end of 1955.

16. At the end of 1954, the average flying training for combat aircrews will be 240 hours per year. This level, which coincides with the minimum acceptable standard recommended by NATO, will be maintained for the period 1955-1957.

With regard to the serviceability rate of aircraft, it is noted that for the first six months of 1954 an average of only 57% of the aircraft on hand were in commission and only an average of 53% were combat ready. In this connection, the Canadian authorities have stated that these low rates are due to the conversion to a new type of aircraft and will only be temporary. It is hoped that early improvement will be achieved.

17. It is noted that the number of vacancies for aircrew training in Canada under Canadian Mutual Aid has now been reduced from 1,500 to 1,200. It is appreciated that all available spaces were not filled in the past, but should it prove that there is a need for more than the 1,200 vacancies now planned, it is hoped that Canada will give sympathetic consideration to increasing this most valuable aid.

II. PRODUCTION AND PROCUREMENT

18. Since last year's Annual Review Canada has continued to strengthen her war production base and a high delivery rate of practically all major military end-item in production is reported, including the much needed AWX aircraft. A marked expansion in the defence electronics industry took place during the last three years. Canada is now producing asdic, radar, fire control and communication equipment.

19. With respect to Mutual Aid, it is to be noted with satisfaction that Canada is concentrating on the delivery of modern equipment. In fact, the 1954/55 Mutual Aid Programme contains approximately 60% by value of equipment produced since April 1950, and only about 10% of World War II equipment which, when necessary, is reconditioned before being offered for delivery to European NATO countries. The remainder of this programme is accounted for largely by aircrew training and infrastructure.

III. DEFENCE EXPENDITURES AND POLITICO-ECONOMIC CONSIDERATIONS

Defence Expenditures

20. Expenditures for defence since 1949 are compared with the figures shown last year in the following table:

Canadian Fiscal Years (April-March) (million dollars)

	1949/50	1950/51	1951/52	1952/53	1953/54	1954/55	1955/56	1956/57
AR(53)	411.4	640.0	1540.1	1967.0	2135.5	—	—	—
AR(54)					1844.8	2066.8	—	—

In general, it appears that planned expenditures for 1954/55 are consistent with force plans. The Canadian Memorandum points out that once a physical programme has been established by the Canadian Government, the carrying out of that programme has never been hampered by the inadequate provision of funds by Parliament.

21. Total defence expenditures fell short of original Review forecasts by $159 million in 1952/53 and $291 million in 1953/54. The Canadian authorities have stated that a general factor contributing to the underexpenditure of appropriations is the very considerable difficulty of estimating rates of expenditure in advance, particularly on the production of military equipment, in a period of rapid build-up; and that though shortfalls may occur in future, they may be expected to diminish as the defence effort levels off.

22. Budgetary provision for Mutual Aid for 1954/55, at $300 million, is $24 million lower than the main estimate for 1953/54, though somewhat higher than the actual out-turn for 1953/54. The reduction affects principally the aircrew training programme, expenditures on the initial provision of capital facilities for the programme having tapered off. Table 7 at Annex I shows the development of the Mutual Aid Programme, by value, since its inception.

23. The submission contains no tables for defence expenditures beyond 1954/55, but the Canadian authorities now state that the implementation of the overall programme for the Canadian forces, at any rate for 1955/56, would probably entail expenditures of the same order of magnitude as those for the current year, and that it is intended to ask Parliament at the beginning of each fiscal year for sufficient funds to fulfil the physical commitments shown in Section A of the reply.

Politico-Economic Considerations

24. After several years of rapid economic growth in Canada, a gradual recession developed in the last quarter of the year 1953 and continued into the first half of 1954. Among the factors contributing to this recession were the tapering off of the growth in defence outlays, the termination of some large investment projects and lower exports, together with a more cautious attitude towards the accumulation of stocks and a reduction in the heavy demand for durable goods. Unemployment in June 1954 amounted to 3.4% of the civilian labour force, twice the June 1953 level. For this current year as a whole, a slight fall in defence spending and a downward change in inventories are likely to outweigh a small expansion of other civilian demand. External demand for Canadian products has fallen and the terms of trade have moved adversely, but imports have fallen even more markedly. Thus, the current balance of payments, which had reverted in 1953 to the deficit position characteristic of postwar years, showed an appreciably lower deficit during the first half of 1954 than during the same period in 1953. Canadian reserves remain high and the inflow of foreign capital continues.

Annual Recurring Costs

25. The Canadian submission does not reflect Canada's long-term recurring costs, but rather the recurring cost elements of the budget for 1954/55 forces. Annual operating costs are estimated at $1,019 million and total planned replacement at $682 million giving a total of $1,701 million (of which the Air Force accounts for $833 million, more than the other two services combined). The difference between this figure and total planned expenditures of $2,067 million for the same fiscal year is largely accounted for by Canadian Mutual Aid. A preliminary International Staff analysis (which also leaves mutual aid to other countries out of account) suggests a cost of between $1,600 million and $1,700 million for forces in being after 1957.

26. The Canadian submission does not give any appraisal of the economic implications of annual recurring costs. Recent levels of defence expenditure higher than the estimated annual recurring costs have not, however, prevented the rapid development of the economy and it is difficult to be anything but optimistic about Canada's longterm capabilities.

IV. CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE INTERNATIONAL STAFF

27. The International Staff:

(a) Note that certain adjustments or improvements, as described in the previous paragraphs of this report would still further enhance the value of the Canadian contribution to NATO;

(b) Draw the special attention of the Canadian Government to the recommendations of the NATO military authorities in Annex II, which emphasize the primary importance of the need to:

(i) Plan for the introduction of RCAF all weather fighter squadrons in substitution for some of the day fighter squadrons at present assigned to SACEUR;

(ii) Ensure adequate support in Europe for the Canadian land forces;

(iii) Accelerate the arrival in Europe of RCAF ground units for air control and early warning;

(iv) Improve the time phasing of escort vessels;

(c) Recommend that:

Bearing in mind the priorities indicated by the NATO military authorities, the Canadian authorities should, within the planned level of defence expenditures, endeavour to implement military recommendations to the greatest possible extent. Furthermore the International Staff consider that an increase in the planned defence effort would be within the economic capabilities of Canada;

(d) Recommend that the Canadian authorities should:

(i) Continue mutual aid programmes, as of great importance to NATO. In this respect it is noted with satisfaction that the Canadian Government is concentrating on the delivery of modern equipment, with provision for the supply of spare parts as appropriate;

(ii) Indicate to the Council, by the time of the ministerial meeting in December 1954, which of the military recommendations can be accepted by that date and, where appropriate, reflected in the agreed force goals of the 1954 review;

(iii) Maintain close touch with the NATO military authorities — and the International Staff, where appropriate — regarding contemplated changes or adjustments in their country's defence plans, including those designed to enable them to implement as far as possible the remaining military recommendations in Annex II to this report.

COMPLETE LIST OF MILITARY RECOMMENDATIONS

MOST IMPORTANT RECOMMENDATIONS IN ORDER OF PRIORITY REGARDLESS OF SERVICE

1. Expedite the study of the implications involved in the substitution of AWX's for DIF's, with a view toward meeting a goal of one (1) Squadron (18 A/C) in 1956 and a total of four (4) Squadrons (72 A/C) end 1957, in place of four (4) Squadrons (110 A/C) of IDF's.
2. Ensure, in consultation with SACEUR, adequate support in Europe for the Canadian Land Forces.
3. Phase forward the Tactical Air Control Centre and the two (2) Control and Reporting Centres so that they may be deployed in Europe by end 1955.
4. Improve time-phasing of DDEs and DEs.

PRIORITIES BY SERVICE

The following additional recommendations are shown in order of priority within each service. They are not in order of priority as between services.

5. Navy

- (1) Modernise "Lancaster" aircraft that will remain in service beyond 1956 by:
 - (1) replacing H2S radar with APS-33 radar,
 - (2) fitting of directional search receiver equipment,
 - (3) fitting of directional sono-buoy equipment,
 - (4) fitting of "Glow Worm" or multi-barrel discharger night illumination equipment.
- (2) Progress the construction of the prototype of the proposed "VANCOUVER" class frigate.
- (3) Increase the overall number of DEs by four (4) at D+180 in 1957.
- (4) Increase submarine services for anti-submarine training.
- (5) Complete bilateral agreement and arrangement for the use of specific facilities and services of other nations.
- (6) Expedite the storing overseas of stocks of non-common-use items required for D-Day forces.
- (7) Expand the plans for fitting IFF Mark X equipment to include at least one (1) interrogator in all ships having search radar.

- (8) Pursue the development of the helicopter in the anti-submarine role.
- (9) Adapt a system of aircrew categorisation for maritime/patrol aircrews.

6. Air Force

- (1) Attain and maintain the MC-26/3 Standard of Readiness in all units as early as possible.
- (2) Take the necessary action to increase the percentage of aircraft in commission and combat ready with a view to attaining as soon as possible at least the figure of 70%.

SUGGESTED CANADIAN COMMENTS FOR INCLUSION IN ANNEX III OF THE CANADIAN COUNTRY CHAPTER

27. The International Staff:

- (a) note that certain adjustments or improvements, as described in the previous paragraphs of this Report, would still further enhance the value of the Canadian contribution to NATO;
- (b) draw the special attention of the Canadian Government to the recommendations of the NATO military authorities in Annex II, in which these authorities emphasize the primary importance of the need to:
 - (i) plan for the introduction of RCAF all-weather fighter squadrons in substitution for some of the day fighter squadrons at present assigned to SACEUR;

Comment

The subject of substitution of all-weather fighters for day interceptors in No. 1 Air Division is under active study at the present time and has been given a very high priority, taking careful consideration of SHAPE's recommendations. Whether Canada will be able to make an all-weather fighter contribution and, if so, the date of availability will depend on a number of domestic factors which have yet to be resolved.

- 27(b) (ii) ensure adequate support in Europe for the Canadian Land Forces;

Comment

Discussions have been held with United Kingdom authorities on the composition of the non-organic support units for Canadian Infantry Brigade Group and in due course for the balance of 1 Canadian Infantry Division. The non-organic support units now on the continent are considered adequate to deal with the purely Canadian administration of the Brigade Group, and these will be augmented to meet the needs of the complete division when the balance of the division is assigned to SACEUR subsequent to M-day. It does not appear logical or economical that Canada should provide a complete divisional slice for the support of one division. Such support should be provided by the larger formations with which the Canadian division is associated. Canada does not intend, therefore, to provide additional logistic or combat support units for the Division.

27(b) (iii) accelerate the arrival in Europe of RCAF ground units for air control and early warning: (Referred to in the Military Recommendations in Annex II as "Tactical Air Control Centre and Control and Reporting Centres" and in para 15 of the Country Chapter as "ground control intercept complex.")

Comment

The RCAF has decided to provide an improved type of radar for No. 1 Air Division. While no firm date can be given as to the availability of these facilities, it is expected that they will be available by 1 December 1955.

27(b) (iv) improve the time phasing of escort vessels.

Comment

Improvement in the time-phasing of existing ships in reserve is constantly under study. It is fully appreciated that the most critical period for the defence of shipping in the North Atlantic is between D-Day and D+60. Every effort will be made to increase the availability of escort type ships on D-Day and D+30, but until the current studies are completed, no change in the present assignment of these forces can be made.

27(d) recommend that the Canadian authorities should:

- (ii) indicate to the Council, by the time of the Ministerial meeting in December 1954, which of the military recommendations can be accepted by that date and, where appropriate, reflected in the agreed force goals of the 1954 Review.

Canadian Reply

The following military recommendations are accepted:

Recommendation 5(1)

Modernise "Lancaster" aircraft that will remain in service beyond 1956 by:

- (1) replacing H2S radar with APS-33 radar,
- (2) fitting of directional search receiver equipment,
- (3) fitting of directional sono-buoy equipment,
- (4) fitting of "Glow Worm" or multi-barrel discharger night illumination equipment.

Comment

20 Lancasters will be modified by May 1955 as follows:

- (a) H2S radar will be replaced with APS-33.
- (b) Fitment of UPD-501, a broad directional search receiver capable of reception on the 3 or 10 centimetre band as desired, but not simultaneously.
- (c) Fitment of ARR26/SSQ2, non-directional search sono-buoy is not contemplated.
- (d) Fitment of APX-6B-IFF transponder.
- (e) Fitment of 1.7 inch flare, hand launched.

Recommendation 5(4)

Increase submarine services for anti-submarine training.

Comment

Canada has concluded negotiations with the UK authorities and by summer 1955 anti-submarine training facilities will be adequate.

Recommendation 5(7)

Expand the plans for fitting IFF Mark X equipment to include at least one (1) interrogator in all ships having search radar.

Comment

RCN plans provide for the fitting of interrogators in all ships earmarked for assignment to SACLANT.

Recommendation 5(8)

Pursue the development of the helicopter in the anti-submarine role.

Comment

The procurement of helicopters for experiment and evaluation in the anti-submarine role is now underway.

Recommendation 5(9)

Adapt a system of aircrew categorisation for maritime/patrol aircrews.

Comment

A system of aircrew categorisation for maritime patrol aircrews is presently under consideration by the RCAF and such a system will be introduced in the near future.

Recommendation 6(1)

Attain and maintain the MC-26/3 Standard of Readiness in all units as early as possible.

Comment

Canada will do everything possible to attain and maintain MC-26/3 Standard of Readiness in all units as early as possible.

Recommendation 6(2)

Take the necessary action to increase the percentage of aircraft in commission and combat ready with a view to attaining as soon as possible at least the figure of 70%.

Comment

At the present time, the Air Division is converting to Sabre 5 aircraft. As this is a new type aircraft, they are encountering maintenance and logistic problems common to all aircraft when first placed in the field. It is anticipated that with the experience being gained these problems will soon be resolved.

27(d) (iii) maintain close touch with the NATO military authorities — and the International Staff, where appropriate — regarding contemplated changes or adjustments in their country's defence plans, including those designed to enable them to implement as far as possible the remaining military recommendations in Annex II to this report.

Comment

Canada has in the past and will continue to maintain close touch with the Standing Group and the Supreme Commanders, and where appropriate, with the International Staff regarding contemplated changes or adjustments in their plans for forces earmarked for or assigned to NATO.

I. NATO ANNUAL REVIEW; CANADIAN COUNTRY CHAPTER

1. The Minister of National Defence presented the report of the Panel on the Economic Aspects of Defence Questions on the Canadian country chapter to be included in the NATO Annual Review Report. The country chapter had been prepared by the NATO Secretariat with the assistance of certain designated delegations, and took into account the comments of the NATO Supreme Commanders. The Canadian Delegation to NATO had been able to secure a number of amendments which produced a fairer and more accurate presentation of the Canadian position. The conclusions and recommendations in Part IV of the chapter remained the responsibility of the NATO Secretariat, and the military recommendations in Annex II remained the responsibility of the NATO Supreme Commanders and the Standing Group. These recommendations did not commit member governments in any way, although member governments were asked to consider them seriously and to comment upon them. The proposed Canadian comments were contained in Annex III to the chapter. While these comments made no mention of the mutual aid programme, the Panel suggested that a statement be made by one of the Ministers attending the forthcoming Ministerial meeting of the North Atlantic Council, reviewing the mutual aid programme up to date, and saying what was possible about future mutual aid policy. A draft of this proposed statement would shortly be submitted for ministerial approval.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Memorandum, Chairman of the Panel on the Economic Aspects of Defence Questions, November 22, 1954 — Cabinet Defence Committee Document No. D19-54).

2. In the course of discussion, the following points emerged:

(a) Considering the process by which it had been produced, the country chapter was a reasonably satisfactory document. It contained nothing that was particularly new, nor did the Canadian comments proposed for inclusion in Annex III. The last sentence of paragraph 12 of the chapter was too rigid a statement, in view of the fact that it referred to the period to the end of 1958. While it was perhaps not necessary to ask that this statement be modified, it might be indicated to the Secretariat, or a comment might be made during the Ministerial meeting that the government viewed the question of maintaining 300 interceptors in Europe to the end of 1958 more tentatively than this statement would suggest, and in fact that all figures quoted in the chapter for the period after 1955 were planning figures only so far as the government was concerned. The same qualifying observation should be made with regard to Section III of the chapter, "Defence Expenditures and Politico-Economic Considerations".

(b) The proposed comment on the recommendation to substitute some all-weather fighters for day interceptors was satisfactory in that it noted that the recommendation was receiving careful consideration, without indicating when a decision might be expected. The remarks on the arrival in Europe of ground units for air control and early warning took into account the decision made nine months ago to supply fixed rather than mobile radar equipment. The comment on the recommendation to ensure adequate support in Europe for the Canadian land forces would be improved if the third sentence were altered to read, "It does not appear to be logical, or to be making the most sensible use of our resources for Canada to provide a complete divisional slice for the support of one division".

3. The Committee:

(a) noted with approval the report of the Panel on the Economic Aspects of Defence Questions, subject to the one alteration in the wording of the comments for inclusion in Annex III to the country chapter given in paragraph 2(b) above;

(b) agreed that the NATO Secretariat should be informed that the Canadian government viewed all figures quoted in the country chapter for the period after 1955 as being planning figures only, no matter how confidently they might be stated in the chapter; and that this cautionary observation applied particularly to the reference in paragraph 12 to the number of aircraft which Canada would be maintaining in Europe for the next four years; and,

(c) agreed that a statement reviewing Canada's Mutual Aid programme up to date and saying what is possible about future mutual aid policy be prepared for delivery at the forthcoming NATO Ministerial Meeting.¹¹

MUTUAL AID PROGRAMME FOR 1955/56

The Sub-Panel on the Economic Aspects of Defence at its meeting on December 6 had before it an official level draft† mutual aid programme for 1955/56 totalling $185 million. This figure includes, however, $10 million for the military costs of the NATO Budget covered in the estimates for previous years under a separate heading. The figure comparable with last year's vote would, therefore, be $175 million (as foreshadowed in my memorandum of Oct. 26, 1954).

This figure compares with last year's programme under which $280 million were earmarked for mutual aid (plus $12 million for the military costs of the NATO budget) on the understanding that an additional $20 million might be used for this purpose if the funds were not required by the Canadian military services. In fact expenditures are expected to total about $260 million for 1954/55. The proposed figure for the coming year can therefore be regarded as being between $75 and $125 million less than that for the current year.

Generally the draft programme would appear to reflect the criteria approved by Cabinet Defence Committee on November 12, although it would not seem to have allowed for the observation recorded in the minutes of that meeting to the effect that, "There was an added criterion of a political nature governing Canada's mutual aid policy. This was found in the general desire to cooperate in building up the strength of NATO forces and mutual aid would remain to some extent as part of the burden-sharing exercise adopted by all NATO nations."

On the basis of informal discussions at the Sub-Panel, it appears that while there is opposition to any increase of the $175 million total in 1955/56, it might be physically possible to devote a somewhat larger sum to mutual aid for 1955/56 if the Government were to decide that a larger figure was desirable.

The present draft programme is confined to the kinds of items which the Canadian Services will require in the future and for which, consequently, they consider it desirable to maintain production facilities in operation. No items which were not of such direct interest to the Canadian Services have been included in the new production programme apart from a small carryover from previous years even though some of these items which we have been producing in the past might be of considerable value to other NATO forces (e.g. No. 4 Mark 6/2 radar sets). The programme could be expanded by bringing in some of these excluded items and keeping the production facilities (which will otherwise be closed down or switched to other products) in operation specifically to meet these NATO needs.

In the case of items which have been included in the present programme, the quantities allotted to mutual aid could be increased if more emphasis were to be given to NATO requirements and if production were not kept down to what is considered the minimum economic rate. So far in the preparation of the programme Mutual Aid has been regarded as merely the residue. An estimate has been made of the volume of production which would result in not unreasonable unit costs. The requirements of the Canadian Services have then been deducted from that figure and the remainder has been regarded as the amount available for Mutual Aid even though the NATO requirement might be many times as large. If our production capacity were to be more fully utilized, we would be able to provide an increased amount under Mutual Aid in several lines (e.g. walkie-talkie radio sets, explosives, and ammunition).

The possible increases in the size of the Mutual Aid programme from these sources during this year, do not, however, appear to be very large. At the outside, they might be something like $20 million. This would seem to be about the physical limit unless Mutual Aid is to be provided in forms other than those normally included in our programmes, for example the payment of shipping charges or even the provision of direct economic aid.

At the Sub-Panel meeting, there were intimations, however, that instead of the total of $175 million being increased, it might well be reduced by the deletion of the item for the F86 aircraft with Orenda engines, representing approximately $35 to $40 million unless this Department saw fit to intervene. This reduction would be based on the following arguments:

(a) The provision of F86 aircraft with Orenda engines might involve serious maintenance and overhaul problems for the receiving countries.

(b) Provision of this equipment might imply a commitment on Canada's part to accept responsibility for the provision of spare and replacement parts (including engines) in the future. This was not true of the old F86 which had U.S. engines and other equipment for which the United States assumed responsibility.

(c) These F86 aircraft could be used by reserve units in Canada to whom allocations of similar aircraft might have to be made in subsequent years if these were to go to Mutual Aid.

It is necessary to consider whether in these circumstances we should work to maintain or even to increase the tentative Mutual Aid figure of $175 million in 1955/56.

Since the programme will need to be settled shortly, you may wish to discuss it with Mr. Harris and Mr. Campney before the NATO Delegation leaves for Paris; and with Mr. Howe after your arrival in Paris.

NATO ANNUAL REVIEW, 1954: MUTUAL AID

A draft statement on Canadian mutual aid for possible use at the forthcoming Ministerial Meeting has been prepared, taking into account your useful suggestions, and has been approved by the Deputy Ministers of National Defence and Defence Production and the Sub-Panel on the Economic Aspects of Defence Questions. We plan to include it with an appropriate explanatory note in the briefs for the Ministerial Delegation, but thought you might wish to see it in advance.

2. Following is the text. Begins:

I wish at this time to make a brief statement concerning Canadian Mutual Aid policy, with reference to the broad recommendation made to us in the Canadian Country Chapter. While the NATO Aircrew Training Programme and provision for the Canadian contributions to the cost of NATO common infrastructure facilities and the NATO Budgets continue to represent large portions of our programme, my remarks will refer particularly to the end-item aid portion of our programme.

In 1950, the year of the original Canadian Mutual Aid Programme, there existed within NATO general deficiencies of equipment to which it was considered Canada could most effectively contribute by transferring as Mutual Aid large existing stocks of armament and ancillary equipment and by increasing indigenous Canadian capacity for defence production to meet the needs of Canada and the other countries in the Alliance.

The emphasis in earlier programmes was on equipments from existing stocks not immediately needed by the Canadian Forces. The more recent programmes have contained an increasing proportion of the current types of materials and equipment which have benefited the North Atlantic Alliance as a whole. Equipments of current types have been transferred as Mutual Aid with a view to serving the dual purpose of developing and maintaining productive capacity in Canada to meet the equipment needs of the Canadian Forces and of contributing to meet the equipment needs of the forces of Canada's NATO Allies, thereby reducing overall NATO deficiencies.

Now, we find ourselves, in common with other members of the Alliance, concerned with the problem of keeping in being the essential elements of the existing production base rather than with the development of a broader base. Our first response to this situation has been to undertake an examination of our production capabilities from the aspect of a mobilization potential. When this analysis has been completed we shall be able to identify more clearly than at present those elements of the existing base which should be retained and to consider whether Canadian Mutual Aid equipment transfers could be used as a means to assist in the accomplishing of this new end.

At the same time as the emphasis in the supply of equipment and the development of the production base has changed, there has been an increasing requirement for additional Canadian efforts for North American Continental Defence for the purpose of providing an effective defence of a firm base for the support of operations for the defence of Europe and to defend the retaliatory capacity of North America. These new and additional commitments undertaken in this connection are, therefore, the same kind of contribution to our common defence as those involved in stationing forces in Europe and in the supplying of equipment under the Mutual Aid programme. These are all important factors in the defence of the NATO area.

With respect to next year, the exact extent and composition of our programme have not yet been settled. However, owing to the considerations which I have outlined, and in the light of the overall limitation in our defence expenditures, it is apparent that there will be a reduction in end-item aid in 1955/56. However, at the same time, the NATO Aircrew Training Programme will be continued at its present level of a total of 1200 entries annually, the emphasis on new pattern equipment will be maintained, and, where necessary, spares support will continue to be given for certain equipment already furnished, although it is our hope that European countries will make every effort to avoid dependence on our Mutual Aid programmes in this regard. As in the past, while it will rest with my Government to decide what equipment and supplies are to be offered, their allocation among the various NATO countries will take into consideration the recommendations requested from the Standing Group or the International Staff.

Our Permanent Delegation will inform the Council of the actual content of our programme for the coming year, together with any necessary supporting detail, as soon as it has been established.¹² Ends. Message Ends.

CABINET, DECEMBER 9, 1954

SUBSTITUTION OF 4 CF-100 SQUADRONS FOR 4 F-86 SQUADRONS
IN RCAF AIR DIVISION, EUROPE

The case for substituting four CF-100 Squadrons for four F-86 Squadrons in Europe is set forth in the attached memorandum for the Cabinet. From the point of view of our relations with our NATO partners there is certainly a great deal to be said for concurring in the recommendation. I think, however, that very careful consideration should be given to the possible implications for North American defence, and to the possible implications for our NATO relations if a decision taken now should have to be reversed in a year or two.

2. In informal discussions that we have had in the P.J.B.D. and elsewhere, we have learned something of the thinking of U.S. defence authorities. As a result, it is becoming increasingly evident that we are likely to be faced in the not too distant future with a choice between permitting United States squadrons to operate from bases in southern Canada, and providing squadrons ourselves. This might mean in effect that we would have to bring squadrons home from Europe. This would be unfortunate in any case — whether the CF-100's had actually arrived in Europe or not.

3. In paragraph 8(c) of the memorandum it is proposed that the NATO recommendation be accepted subject to the condition that we might have to switch types again if and when we considered such action to be in the best general interests. I fear that if we had to bring back our CF-100's soon after sending them to Europe — or, worse, if we should be compelled to reverse our decision before any substitution had been effected — the political effect on our NATO allies might be worse than if we were to tell them now that, after careful consideration, we had come to the conclusion that we cannot accept the recommendation.¹³

SUBSTITUTION OF FOUR CF-100 SQUADRONS FOR FOUR F86 SQUADRONS IN RCAF AIR DIVISION, EUROPE

1. For the past two years SHAPE has requested strongly that, to bolster the air strength of Western Europe, Canada should provide four squadrons of all-weather fighter aircraft (CF-100's) in substitution of four squadrons of Interceptor Day Fighter aircraft (F86's). The request is for one squadron (18 CF-100's) in 1956 and three squadrons (54 CF-100's) by the end of 1957. In reply to the most recent request, Canada has pointed out that whereas urgent domestic factors had stood in the way of acceding to previous SHAPE requests for all-weather aircraft our position was now developing to the point where we could give serious consideration to SHAPE's recommendation.

2. During the period 1955-58 the major air threat facing SACEUR lies in the TU4 and the IL28 bomber aircraft which are capable of operating effectively by day, by night and in bad weather, carrying atomic bombs. The NATO air defence forces available to meet this threat are almost entirely day interceptors. The lack of any appreciable air defence capability at night or in bad weather gives the enemy a tremendous advantage in being able to mount an attack under these conditions where the probability of success at very little cost to his own forces is practically assured. The air defences of Europe must be brought into balance as quickly as possible to deny the enemy this advantage and discourage any thoughts he might have concerning his comparative freedom of action to employ his bomber forces.

3. There is a serious shortage of All Weather Fighter aircraft and none in operation in the world today are better in all-round performance than the CF-100 which is capable of matching the threat of the enemy TU4 and the IL28 bombers. A contribution of 72 CF-100 aircraft would materially strengthen the All Weather capability of the air defences of Europe and would have a deterrent effect out of all proportion to the numbers of aircraft and the costs involved. Accordingly, NATO is looking to Canada to make this contribution.

4. Examination of the factors involved reveals that there is sound military reason why Canada should provide all-weather fighters in Europe and that there is no sound military reason for not doing so.

5. Having the same type of aircraft at home and overseas would permit the RCAF to gain the broadest possible experience in all-weather operations which is the primary requirement in the North American Air Defence System. At the same time it would eliminate much of the duplication in training now necessary for personnel transferred between home and overseas units.

6. The Regular Force all-weather squadrons in Canada will be built up to operational strength early in 1956. Intense study is continuing into the question of which aircraft, CF-100 or F86, would provide the greatest possible effectiveness in Reserve Squadrons in the crucial early stages of war. These squadrons are scheduled to receive modern operational aircraft commencing in mid-1955 but are not expected to reach operational standards of readiness until 1958 because of the limited time available to Reserve personnel for service training. Thus the transfer progressively of four Squadrons of 18 aircraft each to Europe commencing in late 1956 can be achieved without any significant effect on the capability of the Reserve elements of the home defence forces in this period.

7. The exchange of the CF-100 aircraft for F86 aircraft in the home defence service in Canada would be at some expense to the all-weather capability in the home air defence system. This would be counterbalanced in part by the added height capability inherent in day fighter aircraft. Also new developments and electronic advances now in prospect would, if successful, give the F86 a limited night and bad weather capability thus further increasing the effectiveness of the aircraft and making it a more attractive addition to the North American Defence System than heretofore. Based on the developments and experience gained in the next few years, a mixture of CF-100's and F86 aircraft in the home defence force should provide the most effective utilization of our fighter aircraft.

8. A decision to send all-weather squadrons to Europe would be made subject to the following conditions:

(a) Squadrons would be located on existing Air Division Bases and not be redeployed elsewhere.

(b) The all-weather squadrons would remain part of RCAF Air Division, Europe. They would come under the command of the AOC, Air Division, who would continue to exercise operational and administrative control over the whole force as empowered in his existing command instructions.

(c) The exchange would be made without prejudice to reverting to 12 Interceptor Day Fighter squadrons if and when, in the light of changing conditions, Canada considers such action to be in the best general interests.

9. Attached as Appendix "A"† is an estimate of the manpower and financial implications arising from this exchange of squadrons. In summary, the implications are as follows:

(a) Manpower increases for the Air Division will total approximately 244.

(b) Additional construction and equipment costs are estimated to be $10,570,000.

10. The Chiefs of Staff Committee have thoroughly assessed all aspects of this problem and recommend this substitution as a logical and desirable step for Canada to take. I concur with their views and recommend that four CF-100 squadrons of 18 aircraft each be assigned to Air Division Europe to replace four F86 squadrons.¹⁴

AGENDA FOR THE NEXT MINISTERIAL MEETING

At the informal luncheon session on March 31, there was a long and inconclusive discussion of the suggestion that Ministers might exchange views on the development of political consultation.

2. As expected, the Danish and the Norwegian representatives felt that while some progress had been made in this field, an attempt should be made to develop present arrangements. I supported their position arguing that the habit of consultation was important as a means of strengthening the alliance and pointing out that, so far, only the Big Three had adopted the practice of consulting the Council on their agreed policy concerning Germany. I suggested that other countries, and in particular the Secretary General, might be encouraged to take more initiative in this regard.

3. The United Kingdom representative took a somewhat negative line interpreting, I am afraid, my remarks as implying some criticism of the Big Three. I made it clear that I had merely suggested that other countries and the Secretary General should try to follow the example of the Big Three. The United States representative, although reticent, made the point that his government attached importance to the development of political consultation.

4. In the end, no firm decision was made whether Ministers should be warned that the subject would be raised under the general political item, although I understood that both the Danish and the Norwegian Foreign Ministers might discuss the matter.

5. It seems to me that a number of points are clear as regards political consultation:

(a) The strengthening of the habit of consultation is vital to the development of the alliance;

(b) A majority of the member governments are in favour of developing the present arrangements;

(c) The Big Three are reluctant to take any initiative in this field; the British, in particular, prefer, it seems to me, bilateral consultation with us, the Benelux countries and Denmark and Norway, perhaps because of concern as regards their position vis-à-vis the United States as leader of the Commonwealth and of a number of European partners;

(d) Further progress is unlikely, therefore, to be made unless specific proposals are submitted to the Council.

6. Under the circumstances, I wonder whether we should not consider submitting, at the next Ministerial Meeting of the Council, a broad resolution, stressing the importance of political consultation as a means of strengthening the alliance and inviting the Council in permanent session to consider ways and means whereby the habit of political consultation could be developed. If such a resolution were adopted, it would provide a good basis for further discussions of the subject in Council; the Secretariat might be invited later on, in the light of these discussions, to submit detailed proposals for consideration by member governments. I am inclined to think that this is not a field where regulations are as important as attitudes, but if the subject is kept under discussion greater awareness of its importance will be developed and this in itself is bound to produce in time worthwhile results.

THE SOVIET NOTE

The latest Soviet note is an expression of both the Soviet permanent philosophy and recent tactics. As I interpret it, the note suggests, within the framework of peaceful coexistence with the USA, a joint Soviet—USA control of Europe. Such an approach implies a power conception of politics which corresponds to the Communist way of dealing with situations and an assumption that Germany is the main threat to Europe.

2. If the USA were to accept to join the USSR in the Molotov system for Europe,

(a) the present Soviet control of Eastern Europe would be confirmed;

(b) Germany would be neutralized;

(c) the USSR could extend her influence in Western Europe; in any case, the "respectable" Communist parties would be at once more powerful and instrumental in achieving this policy.

3. As may be seen, the USA are offered peace, at the price of further concessions in Europe: the traditional Soviet approach of making profitable deals which involve an accretion of strength to be used as a basis for further deals which progressively weaken the opponent.

4. If I understand the Soviet move correctly, a further proposal could well be made in Geneva for a similar sharing of influence in the Far East, for a while, during the period of consolidation.

5. The reply for the USA (and indeed for the United Kingdom and France which would be reduced to third rate powers under the Soviet scheme) as well as for all Western nations is that the Soviet proposal is not compatible with the Western conception of international relations based on the freedom and equality of right of all nations. By stressing the democratic line, the USA can hope to rally the support of the majority of nations which are not prepared to subscribe to the Soviet theory of a two-power domination of the world.

6. As in the case of Germany at the Berlin conference, the Western nations must accept the Soviet challenge and meet it through an assertion of their own basic principles: democracy and freedom both at the national and the international levels.

7. As long as the USSR pursues her present policy, the United Nations will not achieve its objectives and, in particular, provide security, and she has only herself to blame if other nations, in self defence, set up regional organizations like NATO. Under the circumstances, the Soviet desire to join such organizations provides proof of her determination to interfere with legitimate defence arrangements of other nations rather than of peaceful intentions.

8. I should be glad to learn, before the meeting of the Council on April 7 when the Soviet note will be discussed, whether you find yourself in general agreement with the above line.

CONFIDENTIAL

[Ottawa], April 5, 1954

THE RUSSIAN NOTE OF APRIL 1

The Soviet Note is a most cleverly designed approach. It is the best example to date of the new flexibility of Soviet thinking under the post-Stalin dispensation. Its effect on E.D.C. prospects cannot but be bad. As regards NATO, there are two aspects, the immediate and the long term.

2. In the immediate, the point could well be made that NATO is an association of like-minded peoples for the pursuit of accepted principles of freedom and the defence of their way of life and that it arose in large part as the result of fear of Soviet aggression; and that it is based on mutual confidence in one another. NATO would probably not exist, if the United Nations could have given its participants reasonable safeguards against attack. The Soviets threatened Europe and made the United Nations security guarantees inoperative. It is at the United Nations that they must show by deeds that they have mended their ways — disarmament and cooperation in pursuit of its aims.

3. In the long run, NATO having been established and there being more to its purpose than defence, — a community spirit (Article 2) — the removal of the threat to its members' security would push defence in the background and permit of harmonious development of this community of like-minded nations. Future entrants must show that they fulfill the conditions — e.g. respect for freedom; and it takes time to rebuild the confidence that years of sapping operations have brought to a low ebb, and which it would be required that a candidate for membership show before he could be admitted.

4. The Note leaves unanswered two most important questions:

(a) Are the Russians ready to discuss disarmament realistically in the light of the new situation, i.e. possession by both sides of frightful weapons and preponderance of conventional armaments in the eastern camp, and to consider control of atomic energy on the one hand and the scaling down of all armaments to a ratio and not proportionately to present levels.

(b) The Russians assume that the threat to security in Europe is exclusively German. Are they prepared to remove the power vacuum in Central Europe and to re-establish German unity by free elections and for its re-armament in some form but properly controlled.

5. There are however a number of useful points in the Note which should not be let drop flat. They are:

(a) The Soviets show — and admit to their people for the first time — a worry (sincere or otherwise) over the effects of nuclear bombing, which cannot but influence thinking among their leaders and their peoples and brings a new element in policy formation.

(b) The whole portent of the Note is that they do not see us as sheep to shear at will — NATO has been and is useful.

(c) They show a high fear of German re-armament; they speak as if it existed in the West, while it only actually exists now in the East.

(d) They recognize the United States interest in European security and European interest in retaining United States protection.

(e) They do not inject China, irrelevantly, into the European picture.

(f) Their plan is a form of Locarno,¹⁵ which Churchill's May 1953 speech first propounded as a solution of the European security problem.

6. While I agree in large part with Mr. Wilgress' analysis, I think something should be done to underline and exploit these Soviet admissions. In logic, they should accept the re-opening of discussions on disarmament at the United Nations. They should also recognize the necessity of a German settlement in freedom as a condition of effective European security and of the consequent establishment of peaceful and confident co-existence in the European area.

THE SOVIET NOTE OF APRIL 1, 1954

I am glad that members of the Council will be able to comment on the Soviet Note before the three powers have prepared their reply. I understand that the United Kingdom has suggested to the United States and France that a tripartite drafting group be set up in Paris to concert their reply and I assume that this drafting group would take into account the views expressed in the Council. I hope that the Council will also be given an opportunity to discuss the draft reply before it is put in final form. This, as you know, would be in line with my views on political consultation.

The Locarno Pact of December 1, 1925 was a series of agreements negotiated in Switzerland and signed in London whereby Belgium, France, Germany, Italy, and the United Kingdom mutually guaranteed peace in Western Europe.

2. I am in general agreement with the analysis of Soviet policy and motives outlined in your second telegram under reference. With specific reference to the Soviet proposal for a European Security Treaty, however, I would prefer not repeat not to comment for the time being. I do not necessarily take issue with your views but we are still giving the question study. In any case, we are not so directly concerned as others.

3. The proposal that the U.S.S.R. be admitted to NATO is, of course, of direct concern to Canada. In my view rejection of this proposal should be based on the following grounds:

(a) NATO was created precisely to organize for the defence of the countries of the Atlantic Community because they felt themselves in grave peril of Soviet aggression and subversion and because the Soviet Government had demonstrated its determination to prevent the U.N. Security Council (the only machinery for collective security then existing) from functioning.

(b) The Soviet Government has so far not shown by any deeds (as opposed to words) that this basic situation has changed; Soviet armed forces are still at a level which reflects a preponderance of military strength in Europe; rearmament continues to be pushed in the Soviet satellites; rearmament of Eastern Germany goes on apace (which is not true in Western Germany) while the Soviet Government blocks every effort to re-unite Germany on a democratic basis; the Soviet Government continues to maintain sizable occupation forces in Austria and refuses to sign a peace treaty; Communist parties in Western Europe are still used as an instrument of Soviet policy to sabotage every effort at economic recovery and political cooperation.

(c) For these reasons NATO in its present form continues to be essential for the legitimate defence of the free world against possible Soviet aggression.

(d) NATO is also important — perhaps in the long run even more important — as a vehicle of ever closer cooperation between like-minded nations united in a community of interest.

(e) In both these roles NATO is based on far reaching obligations which involve the members in close and continuing cooperation and which require a high degree of mutual confidence and exchange of information in the military, political and economic fields.

4. Although the arguments against the Soviet proposal regarding NATO are clear and overwhelming, I think it is important to ensure that the impression be not created that it is being rejected without serious consideration. On the other hand, we should also try to ensure that the grounds for rejection are frankly stated and that, as you suggest, the Soviet challenge is directly met.

5. I might have added above that if the USSR are genuinely desirous of co-operating in a collective security system, they can show this by their attitude and policy at the UN, as for example in regard to the forthcoming, we hope, talks on atomic matters.¹⁶

NEXT MINISTERIAL MEETING OF THE COUNCIL

I fully agree with you about the importance of further developing political consultation in the Council. I also think as you do that attitudes and habits are more important than rules and procedures in this field and that continuous emphasis on the problem is the best way of encouraging the right attitudes and habits. With this in mind and in view of the increasing interest shown by other members of the Council, I think we should now propose that this subject be placed on the agenda of the next Ministerial meeting as a separate item.

2. After this is done it may prove desirable for the Ministers to adopt some general resolution on the importance of political consultation and we may wish to take the initiative. As yet I have no repeat no firm views on these two questions however, and should welcome it if you would care to try your hand at a draft.

3. I am sending a personal message† to Mr. Lange telling him of my interest in this subject and asking what he thinks might be accomplished at the Ministerial meeting. The text of this message is being repeated to you for your information.

NEXT MINISTERIAL MEETING OF THE COUNCIL

I was sure you would appreciate the importance of further developing political consultation in the Council. I shall be glad to try my hand at a draft general resolution and will send you the draft by telegram as soon as it has been prepared.

2. I do not think it is necessary to propose a separate item on the agenda. The Council approved the recommendation of the Working Group that Ministers might wish either to raise themselves or to see discussed the "possibility of developing political consultation" under the one substantive item on the agenda, viz: "consideration of the international political situation" (reference Para 8 of Document C-M(54)22).

3. If you agree I could write to Lord Ismay indicating that you would wish to see the subject discussed. This would then enable the Permanent Council to give preliminary consideration to the subject at our next meeting on April 20. You might authorize me to outline in general terms the resolution you are thinking of proposing.

4. I have taken the liberty of giving Skaug a copy of your personal message to Mr. Lange. He told me that this coincides with Mr. Lange's views and that he had made a number of public statements on the desirability of developing political consultation. You will also have support from Mr. Hansen of Denmark since it was the Danes who took the initiative of suggesting that the subject be discussed at the Ministerial Meeting.

5. When we had our discussion in the informal session following the luncheon at Lord Ismay's house on March 31, Hughes emphasized the importance the United States Government attach to political consultation. Steel, however, reflected the well-established United Kingdom position of reluctance to develop further political consultation. They prefer that such consultation be conducted in other forums, such as the Commonwealth, Brussels Treaty, and United Kingdom-Scandinavian gatherings, or through consultation with diplomatic representatives in London. Steel takes the attitude that, whenever necessary, consultation does take place in the NATO forum. However, since I have come to Paris the only consultations that have taken place has been when the Three Powers have asked for the views of their NATO partners on replies to be given to Soviet notes. This is extremely valuable but unfortunately the representatives of the Three Powers themselves merely listen to what the other representatives have to say and do not give the views of their own governments until the reply to the Soviet note in question has been drafted. We are then informed a few hours before the note is handed to the Russians and published in the newspapers.

6. An illustration of this attitude was afforded at the interesting discussion we had yesterday on the latest Soviet note. The Netherlands representative went out of his way to propose that the representatives of the Three Powers should take part in the discussion and give the views of their governments as freely as the other representatives had been asked to do. He pointed out that the latest Soviet note was unlike previous notes relating to Germany, for which the Three Powers had special responsibilities. It was of much more direct concern to all the NATO countries. Hughes was the only representative of the Three Powers to respond to this invitation. Steel and Alphand both confined themselves to stating that the views expressed by the other representatives had been of value and would be taken into consideration in the drafting of the reply to the Soviet note.

7. In other words, the attitude of the United Kingdom representative tacitly implies a political standing group within the Council and it is this attitude which is resented by several of my colleagues.

8. What I feel our aim should be is to develop the habit of regular political consultation. The Chairman of the Permanent Council should be encouraged to ask from time to time if there is any political subject the Council would like to have discussed. If it is agreed that there should be consultation on a certain subject, a date could be set for such consultation. This would give representatives the opportunity of receiving instructions from their governments. The Secretary General could also at the same time instruct the Political Division to prepare a background paper giving such facts as were available to the Secretariat. This is the procedure we were trying to develop in the Council deputies but always in the face of passive resistance on the part of the United Kingdom and to a lesser extent of the French representative. I shall endeavour to embody these ideas in the draft resolution which I hope to send you by telegram in a few days.

NEXT MINISTERIAL MEETING OF THE COUNCIL

Following are some notes on points you may wish to bear in mind when considering the manner in which you would wish to introduce the resolution on political consultation at the next Ministerial Meeting:

(a) In view of the conclusions of the paper on trends of Soviet policy that the USSR still aim at dividing the North Atlantic powers, the resolution on political consultation could be related to the discussion on Soviet policy and it could be presented as an effective means of countering Soviet disruptive tactics;

(b) Taking into account United Kingdom susceptibilities as regards political consultation within the Council and the real difficulties involved in developing tripartite agreements in certain fields, it might be desirable to suggest that no criticism is implied of the practice followed so far by the Three Powers who have, in fact, up to now, largely taken the initiative for such political discussions as have taken place in the Council. It could be stressed that what we have in mind is that the other members of the alliance might be encouraged similarly to acknowledge some responsibility for taking the Council into their confidence as regards any of their problems which might be of general concern;

(c) It might be stressed also that the proposals are not to replace existing channels for consultation which are adequate for their purpose nor to suggest that there should be consultation about all topics without regard to their sensitivity to the countries concerned; the proposals are intended to amplify, whenever this appears to be desirable, existing opportunities for fruitful consultation.

"The North Atlantic Council

Having regard to the obligations assumed by the parties to the North Atlantic Treaty and to the fact that each of the parties is affected by developments in the international political situation,

Considering that the sense of unity and solidarity of the alliance will be furthered by regular consultations on the international political situation,

Agrees that it is desirable to develop the habit of frequent political consultations within the Council, Decides that from time to time the Council in permanent session shall discuss what topic would be suitable as a subject for political consultation at one of its subsequent meetings”.

NEXT MINISTERIAL MEETING OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC COUNCIL: POLITICAL CONSULTATION

You will have seen the replies from Paris and Oslo to our telegrams concerning the desirability of discussing the question of political consultation at the next NATO Ministerial Meeting and the possibility of introducing a resolution on the subject. Mr. Lange says that he fully agrees with your views and that the Norwegian Government would be prepared to support a resolution on this matter at the forthcoming meeting. Mr. Wilgress points out that political consultation is not a separate agenda item but that provision has been made for it under the item on the international political situation. He suggests that he might write to Lord Ismay indicating that you wish to see this subject discussed and that you authorize him to outline at the next meeting of the Permanent Council on April 20 the general lines of the resolution you have in mind.

2. I should be grateful to know if you concur in Mr. Wilgress' suggestions.¹⁷

3. The two most recent telegrams from our NATO Delegation in Paris (Nos. 269 and 270 of April 9) contain: (a) some notes on points you may wish to bear in mind in considering the manner in which a resolution on political consultation might be introduced at the Ministerial Meeting; and (b) a suggested draft for such a resolution. Copies of these two telegrams are attached for your convenience.

4. The Department has also tried its hand at a draft resolution, which I now attach for your consideration. It differs from the Delegation's draft in the following respects:

(a) it ties political consultation directly to Articles 2 and 4 of the North Atlantic Treaty;

(b) it takes account of the consideration given to this question previously by the "Committee of Five" and the Rome meeting of the Council, and it reaffirms the conclusions then reached; and

¹⁷ Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Yes [L.B. Pearson]

(c) the operative part of the resolution is addressed not only to the Council in permanent session but also (and primarily) to member governments on the assumption that it is they who must take the initiative if anything effective is to be done.

5. With regard to the notes contained in the attached telegram No. 269, I would offer the following comments:

(a) Although a resolution on political consultation could be presented as an effective means of countering Soviet disruptive tactics, I do not think it should be related solely to present Soviet policy; it should also be related to the positive objective of developing among the various members of the Atlantic Community a closer identity of view, capable of providing a firm and continuing basis for collective action regardless of the existence of a threat or its nature.¹⁸

(b) I fully agree that we should avoid implying any criticism of the practice so far followed by the Three Powers and for this reason the draft resolution attached recommends that all member governments should bear in mind the question of political consultation.¹⁹

(c) I also agree these proposals should not be represented as replacing the existing channels for consultation; in this connection you may wish to point out, as you did in introducing the final report of the "Committee of Five" to the Lisbon meeting of the Council, that what is desirable now is the application of principles already agreed rather than their elaboration.²⁰

6. I should be grateful for your views on my comments in the preceding paragraph and on the attached draft resolution.²¹

The North Atlantic Council

The draft resolution seems satisfactory but I would like to study it more carefully on the way to Paris. I have suggested an addition to the last paragraph. L.B. P[earson]

Recognizing

(a) that the security and well-being of the Atlantic Community depends not only on collective defence measures but also on co-ordinated diplomatic policies;

(b) that developments in the international situation of direct concern to one member of the Atlantic Community may also affect other members and the solidarity of the Community itself; and

(c) that this interdependence of the members of the Community has increased with the increasing destructive capacity of new weapons,

Reaffirms the following views expressed in the Interim Report of the Committee on the North Atlantic Community (Document C8-D/6) and endorsed by the Eighth Session of the North Atlantic Council at Rome:

(a) that "there is a continuing need . . . for effective consultation at an early stage on current problems, in order that national policies may be developed and action taken on the basis of a full awareness of the attitudes and interests of all members of NATO";

(b) that "the achievement of a closer degree of co-ordination of the foreign policies of the members of the North Atlantic Treaty, through development of the habit of consultation on matters of common concern, would greatly strengthen the solidarity of the Atlantic Community and increase the individual and collective capacity of its members to serve the peaceful purposes for which NATO was established"; and

(c) that the objective is "to develop such close consultation between the North Atlantic Governments on particular problems and such co-ordination of action as will best serve the common interest";

Agrees that the North Atlantic Council should be used where appropriate for prior consultation as well as for exchanges of views on political questions of common concern;

Recommends

(a) that all member governments should bear constantly in mind the desirability of bringing to the attention of the Council information on international political developments whenever they are of concern to other members of the Council or to NATO as a whole; and

(b) that the Council in permanent session should from time to time consider what specific subjects might be suitable for political consultation, and that its members should be in a position to express the views of their governments on these subjects.²²

DISCUSSION OF THE TRIPARTITE REPLY TO THE SOVIET NOTE

The Council in permanent session discussed again at its meeting on April 22 the tripartite draft reply to the Soviet Note of March 31 (copy is attached for convenience of reference). There was some discussion as to the timing of the reply. While the United Kingdom and the United States Representatives agreed with your view that, if at all possible, the reply should be returned before the Geneva Meeting, the French Representative insisted that the three Ministers had not yet considered the draft reply and that so far as he knew no agreement had been reached as to the time of the reply.

2. There was also some discussion whether the draft document should be submitted to the Ministers for consideration. After Permanent Representatives had exchanged views on the reply, it was thought that unless any Foreign Minister had important points of substance to raise, it might be better if the Permanent Representatives were to agree to meet on Saturday should anyone of them, having consulted his Minister, have further points of detail to raise.

3. It soon transpired that while some delegations, the Belgian and the Greek in particular, felt that the tone of the note was somewhat too timid, other delegations, the Danish and the Norwegian, thought that, in general, the note was well balanced and would be effective as regards public opinion. It was generally agreed, however, that in certain respects at least the draft required some tidying up. For instance, the United Kingdom Representative recognized that it might be desirable to invert the order of the last two sentences in paragraph 4. The Greek and the Portuguese Permanent Representatives supported our suggestion that it might be preferable to indicate in paragraph 5 that NATO had been created in view of the disparity of strength between the two blocs and that there had been no fundamental change in that situation. These and a few other points will be reported to the drafting group and will be taken into account in the final revision of the draft, in the light of the comments of the three Foreign Ministers principally concerned.

4. As I understand the position, unless one of the Foreign Ministers wishes to raise, at the meeting today, a question of principle or unless one of the Permanent Representatives, after consultation with his Foreign Minister, wishes to have particular points discussed at a meeting Saturday morning, there will be no further Council discussion of the draft reply under reference.²³

IV. COMMUNIQUÉ

MINISTERIAL MEETING OF THE COUNCIL ON APRIL 23RD, 1954

I. PUBLIC SESSION

As usual, the Ministerial meeting began with a public session. The Chairman, M. Bidault, and the Secretary-General, Lord Ismay, made short speeches on the general theme of the fifth Anniversary of the organization. They pointed out that the Alliance had been created to meet the Soviet threat, that during five short years it had achieved important material and moral results; the danger, however, remained and the need for continuing and developing unity and solidarity among the members of the alliance, in the face of subtler Soviet tactics was as great as ever. (Copies of these speeches are attached).

II. BUSINESS SESSION

2. In opening the second part of the meeting, M. Bidault invited the Council to settle three procedural points:

(a) a working Group, under the chairmanship of M. Fenoaltea, the Assistant Secretary-General for political affairs, was appointed to draft the communiqué;

(b) in order to advise General Gruenther as to attendance at his briefing on Saturday, April 24th, a survey was made: it transpired that a large majority of the Foreign Ministers would attend.

(c) a restricted meeting would be held in the course of the day, with only Foreign Ministers, Permanent Representatives, and one adviser.

Item I — Report by the Secretary-General on the Work of the Organization Since the Last Ministerial Meeting

3. Lord Ismay explained that he had not prepared a written report as only four months had elapsed since the last meeting, and as he was preparing a more comprehensive survey covering the first five years of NATO.

4. The major developments since the last meeting were as follows:

- (a) there had been an increase in political consultation;
- (b) emergency planning had gone forward systematically;
- (c) two technical advisers had been appointed in the field of civil defence;
- (d) liaison had been established with the competent military commanders as regards the problem of air defence;
- (e) further progress had been made by the wartime commodity committee and by the shipping boards;
- (f) a good deal had been done as regards information. The fifth anniversary had provided a good opportunity to obtain publicity for the organization;
- (g) a large number of visitors, parliamentarians, journalists, radio officials had been briefed by the Secretariat;
- (h) infrastructure work was proceeding but slowly. Difficulties were due to the number of authorities involved, the technical and varied nature of the projects and the checks and controls which were required.
- (i) a substantially simplified annual review questionnaire had been circulated, and if answers were received in time, a well-considered report would be submitted to the next ministerial meeting.

Item II — Consideration of the International Political Situation

5. At the suggestion of the Chairman, it was agreed to discuss four general subjects under this heading:

- A. Trends and Implications of Soviet Policy.
- B. The Status of the East German Government.
- C. Political Consultation within NATO.
- D. The Duration of the North Atlantic Treaty.

A. Trends and Implications of Soviet Policy

6. Most ministers expressed their appreciation for the Secretariat paper (C.M.(54)33) and their general approval of its conclusions.

Soviet Policy

7. Mr. Zorlu, the Turkish Permanent representative, developed on behalf of the Foreign Minister, the Turkish thesis that the Soviet leaders were hoping to achieve world domination, and that for the time-being, there was a disequilibrium between their ambitions and the means at their disposal. Two stages could be foreseen:

(a) in a first period, the U.S.S.R. are trying to lull the vigilance of their opponents to slow down their defence effort and to divide them.

(b) as soon as they will feel strong enough, Soviet leaders will attempt an open attack.

It was therefore vital, as Soviet policy always reflected an appreciation of the balance of forces between the two blocs, to develop the strength and unity of NATO. This was the only way not only of preserving peace but of obtaining concessions.

8. The Greek Foreign Minister argued for similar reasons that NATO unity and social stability within member countries should be developed; this might convince the Soviet leaders, in the end, that it would be preferable for them to reach negotiated settlements.

9. Mr. Eden agreed that Soviet aims had not changed, and that the disruption of NATO remained the main Communist objective while EDC was the point of attack. If the USSR could not divide the alliance, their second best aim was to keep NATO countries as weak as possible by placing every possible obstacle in the way of a German defence contribution. Berlin had been a test of our solidarity. Soviet diplomacy had become more intelligent since Stalin's death. Soviet leaders wished to prevent an increase of tension, hoping that we will relax and allow our unity to weaken. It was possible that they had domestic and satellite troubles, but they were not prepared to pay a serious price for a relaxation of the tension. They gave an appearance of reasonableness, but were not willing to withdraw from any of their fixed positions in Europe. It was, therefore, necessary to assume that if the camouflage was better, the threat still existed, and long, costly defence efforts had to be continued.

NATO

10. Mr. Eden felt that the NATO countries had launched an experiment of exceptional significance. They had created a unique organization with increasing military and political strength. More importantly, they had set a pattern of co-operation which other countries might, in time, come to imitate, and thus, they had made a great contribution to world peace.

11. M. Beyen was more restrained and somewhat worried about the future for two reasons:

(a) in the past, NATO had worked against a definite menace — the long haul, politically and intellectually presented more difficulties.

(b) in the future, the influence of developments in Asia would become more important in our policies. While a community of conception and purpose was easy to realize in Europe, if we attempted to extend the scope of cooperation beyond the NATO area, political difficulties of a serious nature were bound to arise.

12. M. Beyen added that NATO would have to reconcile two conflicting requirements: on the one hand, what happened in other areas was of concern to NATO but, on the other, it was necessary not to apply NATO solutions to different problems in other areas. There was no sense in suggesting, for instance, that a South Pacific NATO was possible.

13. In the course of his remarks, the Portuguese Foreign Minister made the point that threatening developments outside of the NATO area had repercussions on all member countries. Communist victories in Asia reduced the security of the NATO countries. It was, therefore, in the interests of members of the Alliance to ensure that aggression anywhere should not be successful. Even if the expansion of communism was the main danger, it was not possible to overlook threats from other sources.

14. The Portuguese Foreign Minister went on to say that his government were now facing in Asia problems which might affect the Alliance. The integrity of the Asian provinces of his country were not a matter of concern only to Portugal but they represented advanced positions of the West and their protection had a symbolic significance which it was difficult to overrate. In spite of her legal and moral rights and her best efforts to reach an understanding the relations of Portugal with larger neighbours in Asia were becoming increasingly difficult. If the threat were to materialize, the Portuguese government might have to exercise their right of consultation, as provided in the Treaty. "Territorial integrity" was involved.

(On the eve of the meeting the Portuguese Foreign Minister had called on Mr. Pearson to stress the concern of his government about Portuguese possessions in the Far East. In the course of the conversation there was mention of the remarks which the Prime Minister made during his tour and which had a bearing on the position of Goa.)²⁵

The E.D.C.

15. The Greek Foreign Minister felt that the moral unity of the West was perhaps its most important protection against the new Soviet tactics. This unity would not be complete, however, until Germany had become fully associated with NATO countries. Delays involved uncertainty and weakness.

16. Mr. Eden recalled that the United Kingdom had done their utmost to give practical effect to their support for the E.D.C. He hoped that this would encourage countries to ratify. Every month which passed showed more clearly the need for associating Germany to the Alliance. If no solution was found soon, Germans would become impatient with their status. Further progress towards integration was therefore most urgently required if this fundamental problem was to be solved. If the present opportunity was lost, another might not recur. With all its defects, the E.D.C. still represented the most effective way of bringing Germany into the family.

17. The Netherlands Foreign Minister made a most moving and impressive speech on this subject. He thought that the real problem was not one of raising twelve German divisions or even one of controlling German rearmament, but the essential one of giving Germany the place she deserved in the European community. In the past, Germany had not been willing or able to accept her place, as an equal. She had sought to achieve domination by force, and as a result, she had been compelled to accept often less than equal status. This had created a great and difficult problem for the Germans, and it was to cope with this crucial matter that the E.D.C. plan had been developed. The Benelux countries which had ratified the Treaty had been aware of what the German menace was, but they had gone ahead, in the full realization of the sacrifices and difficulties involved because they felt that this was the one way to solve the problem. They were moved by the political and psychological reluctance of the French to overcome the practical difficulties created by the child of their own logic. Whatever its shortcomings, the E.D.C. was the only approach to the core of the German problem, and its failure would create confusion which would be of benefit only to the enemies of NATO.

18. M. Beyen concluded by stressing that

(a) it was appropriate for those who had ratified to stress again the real importance of quick action and to invite those who were looking for alternative solutions to look at the real issue;

(b) the problems of these future E.D.C. partners who were struggling with the decision were fully understood;

(c) he was grateful to these countries which, being unable to join the E.D.C., had created with it links which would strengthen NATO.

19. The Italian Foreign Minister reported that his government had submitted again to Parliament the E.D.C. Treaty for ratification. The Treaty was in accord with the fundamental European policy which they were pursuing, and they hoped that ratification would be achieved without delay. Allied governments in eliminating existing difficulties could rally democratic popular opinion behind this policy, and thus facilitate the task of the Italian government.

20. The Norwegian and the Danish Foreign Ministers spoke along similar lines. Their countries were unable to join the E.D.C., but they attached the greatest importance to early ratification. Militarily, German contingents could facilitate the defence of Scandinavia; politically, the E.D.C. was the only practical solution to associate a free Germany with the West.

21. M. Bidault seemed to be extremely tired and impatient. His intervention was not at times as lucid as could be desired. He began by expressing his general agreement with those who had spoken before and, in particular, with Messrs. Beyen and Eden. He recalled that, in Berlin, France had pressed for the establishment of a free, democratic and united Germany and that, in the E.D.C. Treaty itself, she had agreed that there should be no discrimination between members, no dominating position for anyone.

22. M. Bidault expressed his gratefulness to the United Kingdom and to the United States governments for their recent declarations. There would be an equitable proportion of United Kingdom and United States forces on the continent, the forward strategy had been confirmed, a degree of integration between the forces assigned to the defence of Europe would be achieved, and the North Atlantic Treaty would be considered as having an indefinite duration. This was an historical gesture without precedent.

23. For their part, the French government (which was not so weak as many suggested) and the French Foreign Minister (who was not so ephemeral as was reported) intended to carry out their pledge and to go ahead with their plans for ratification. It was not helpful, however, to urge ratification through press releases or to speculate publicly how far M. Bidault himself might be prepared to go in defending the Treaty. Furthermore, it was not really necessary to give public advice to the French Foreign Minister as to how he might proceed.

24. At that point, M. Bidault suggested that a working group should be appointed to draft the final communiqué, and the Council dealt with other matters. Later on, at M. Bidault's suggestion, the Council had agreed that another meeting might be held in Paris, later in the year to consider the annual review. Mr. Dulles intervened to point out that, in the interval, circumstances could affect the future and even the existence of the Organization.

25. Mr. Dulles recalled that at the December meeting he had stressed the essential character of the E.D.C. as a means of providing a future for Germany and of adding German strength to the forces available to the Organization to implement the forward strategy. He still believed in what he had said on that occasion. He had also added then that unless action was taken soon, divisive forces might take command. Good progress had been made but no one could say whether divisive forces could not yet make it impossible to achieve a programme which was basic to the future of NATO. It was not possible to assume that everything would stand still until December. If critical conditions were to develop, a meeting might have to be held sooner.

26. M. Bidault thought that Mr. Dulles was right and he was grateful to him for having been right with moderation. He reiterated that his government were determined to wage and win the battle for the E.D.C. Treaty, and urged his colleagues not to take seriously newspaper criticism of United Kingdom and United States guarantees. In some quarters, opposition to the E.D.C. was such that no matter what the United Kingdom or the United States had done, there would have been criticism. M. Bidault thought that other governments could help if they could only refrain from suggesting that all was lost. The French Government were not asking for more, and they hoped that the rest would be left to them! (If, as was reported, Mr. Dulles intended to make a speech in the public session or for the communiqué, on the E.D.C., it is not surprising, in view of the tone of M. Bidault's intervention that Mr. Dulles changed his mind and took the very moderate line which M. Bidault noted with such satisfaction).

The Geneva Conference

27. The Greek and the Portuguese Foreign Ministers suggested that the firm and yet unprovocative line followed in Berlin should be adopted in Geneva.

28. Mr. Eden hoped that the Geneva Conference would be a success and that it would lead to a restoration of peace in Indo-China; he felt that the prospects of a Pacific Pact which might give some stability in that area, depended on the possibility of attracting Asian support. As regards Korea, proposals were to be based on U.N. resolutions urging unification by peaceful means. The Communists were also referring to unification on "democratic terms", and there could be no illusions as to the difficulties involved in reaching an agreement. The United Kingdom were determined for their part, that if the Conference were to fail, as in Berlin, it would be clear to public opinion that the fault was not their own.

B. The Status of the East German Government

29. This matter had been raised by the Secretary-General at the Council meeting on April 20th. He had been instructed then to prepare a draft resolution which was considered and amended by the Council in permanent session on Thursday, April 22.

30. After a short discussion, the Council agreed that:

- (a) member governments should not recognize the East German Government;
- (b) Permanent representatives would prepare later on a detailed resolution on this subject;
- (c) reference to these decisions should be made in the final communiqué.

C. Political Consultation

31. In the course of his remarks, the Portuguese Foreign Minister emphasized that his government appreciated highly the information given and the consultation which had taken place before the Berlin Conference. They felt that this was a very encouraging practice, and one which should be developed. There were no longer isolated interests; if one member was concerned, so were all the others. Hence, the need for close consultation.

32. Mr. Lange, the Foreign Minister of Norway, was glad that NATO had been able to develop to such an extent the habit of free and frank exchanges of news on matters of common concern. While the problems of peace and war were of a global nature, our Alliance had set explicit limits to the defence commitments of the member countries. From the point of view of retaining the strongest possible support on the part of public opinion for NATO policies, it was important not to create the impression that commitments were extended beyond those approved by Parliaments.

33. In developing political consultation, Mr. Lange felt that it might be useful to distinguish between information on matters affecting peace and security and consultation leading to decisions or commitments to a definite line of action. The latter were justified only in so far as it related to the NATO Treaty area. There was a danger of losing public support in sliding into a kind of universal security arrangement; to meet these broader issues, it was better to envisage interlocking regional security arrangements. Public support for NATO was now based not only on geographical considerations but also in all member countries, there was general acceptance of a common set of ideals, of a certain pattern of political institutions, which were embodied in the Atlantic Community idea. If commitments were extended beyond the present NATO area, the organization would experience much greater difficulties in retaining its unity.

34. Mr. Pearson had circulated a resolution on the subject. He pointed out that his resolution underlined the desirability of using the Council to the maximum extent for political consultation. It was highly satisfactory that an effective and increasingly useful mechanism for consultation had been developed. It was desirable to build up NATO further as an indispensable agency for political cooperation as well as for defence.

35. In the course of his remarks, Mr. Pearson stressed the point that all other member countries were indebted to the Big Three for the part they had played in developing the habit of consultation, among themselves first and then with their NATO partners; it was not intended also to interfere with existing channels of diplomacy.

36. Mr. Pearson agreed with Mr. Lange that there were two fields for political consultation: in respect of situations which involved special obligations and commitments (Articles 5 and 6 of the Treaty); and in respect of situations where military obligations were not involved, but where information was most useful (Article 4). While in the first case the limits of our obligations could not be extended without the approval of Parliaments, in the second case there was no limitation. When one or more member countries were making or contemplating decisions which resulted in proposals or policies which might affect the organization as a whole, it was important that there should be consultation. Even if some member countries were not directly concerned, they might, on occasion, give useful support.

37. In conclusion, Mr. Pearson pointed out that the development of political consultation was significant in terms of Article 2 which was not limited to social and economic cooperation.

38. Mr. Lange, the Norwegian Foreign Minister, strongly supported Mr. Pearson's proposal. He stressed the importance of consultation as far as possible in advance. The Italian and the Danish Foreign Ministers also endorsed the resolution. Mr. Dulles, while agreeing in principle, hoped that the proposal would be given a reasonable interpretation. A government like his own was complex and involved in a network of Treaty obligations. The area of consultation both internal and external could be so extended that it might restrict capacity for action. This might be particularly difficult in cases of emergency. Consultation was a means to an end: it should not prevent appropriate and, on occasion, swift action. On the understanding, which was readily given by Mr. Pearson, the Canadian resolution was adopted. (Copy is attached).

D. Duration of the North Atlantic Treaty

39. This matter had been discussed a few days before by the Council in Permanent Session. The French representative had referred to the declarations made recently by the United Kingdom and the United States governments as to the duration of the North Atlantic Treaty: on that occasion the Permanent representatives of Norway and Denmark had reported that their Foreign Ministers would require time to consult, in accordance with their constitutional practice, the Foreign Affairs Parliamentary Committee. The Council had agreed that the matter might be brought to the attention of Foreign Ministers but that it would not be possible to consider a resolution on the subject in the course of the meeting.

40. In spite of this understanding, M. Bidault indicated that, on behalf of his government, he was prepared to declare that the Treaty was of indefinite duration. This was, he felt, of great advantage to European countries, and he suggested that a general statement might be acceptable to the Council. The Norwegian, the Danish and the Portuguese Foreign Ministers, objected very strongly, and it was agreed that the matter should be considered later by the Permanent Representatives.

41. Mr. Spaak thought that, for purposes of ratification, it might be useful to make the point that if the E.D.C. came into being, the U.S. and the U.K. guarantees incorporated in the North Atlantic Treaty would be extended indefinitely: the Council agreed that a paragraph in the final communiqué might record that the statements in question had been noted with satisfaction. On second thoughts, however, M. Bidault did not feel that such a statement would be particularly helpful, and the paragraph was deleted.

E. Site of the Permanent NATO Headquarters

42. In the course of the meeting, M. Bidault announced that his government had now decided to place at the disposal of the Organization one of the best sites in Paris, at the Porte Dauphine, on the Boulevards Extérieurs. Full particulars would be given to Permanent representatives later. In accepting this offer, the Secretary-General expressed the hope that many delegations would find it possible to have their offices with those of the international staff. Both were serving member governments and cooperation would be facilitated if they could be in the same building.

III. RESTRICTED SESSION

A. United States Security Policy

43. Mr. Dulles admitted in his opening remarks that it was somewhat unpleasant to discuss the use of atomic weapons. The subject did not lend itself to useful public expression, because of limitations which derived from circumstances as well as from moral restraints. It was also important that a potential enemy should not be aware of any such limitations as his problem of defence would be simplified.

44. The primary purpose of the United States in their security policy was to deter aggression and to prevent the outbreak of war. To this end, it was essential to recognize that atomic weapons had a vital part to play. The principal danger to the West was the great concentration of military power within the Soviet bloc, combined with imperialistic purposes which were subject to no moral inhibitions. Their vast array of people and military equipment, centrally located, presented a threat around a periphery of some 20,000 miles. From the center, they could strike in any direction.

45. It was clear that the enemy could never be deterred from aggression if he knew in advance that he would be countered only at the place and through means he had selected. If he were sure of that, if he knew that his means would be met only by like means, he could safely attack where he would be sure that he would have the advantage of power and thus his valuable assets would not be endangered. We knew that it would be difficult if not impossible for the Free World to attempt to match the non-atomic military strength of the Soviets. If we attempted to do so, we would develop economic and social strains so serious that we would be losing strength and exposing ourselves to subversion and unrest, to forms of attack against which we must also be on guard.

46. The Soviet Union had atomic weapons and had trained her permanent forces personnel in the employment of such weapons. We must assume that, in case of war, the U.S.S.R. will use atomic weapons and try to achieve maximum surprise. As the enemy would enjoy the advantage of surprise, the United States Government believed that the risk of Soviet aggression by means of open war could be minimized to the extent that the Free World maintained a posture of superiority through adequate retaliatory strength. It was therefore the basic policy of the U.S.A. to develop and maintain military strength with emphasis on the capacity to exert retaliatory power. The U.S. government believed, however, that the security posture of the Free World could be adequate only if atomic means were integrated within its overall military capabilities.

47. If the Free World did not enjoy an instant and formidable capacity to retaliate, it would be dominated now by the U.S.S.R. Their power was restrained by the fear of retaliation, the fear of defeat, and the fear that in the end, their régime would collapse. The power to strike back, in a state of instant readiness was therefore vital until effective control of atomic power, with adequate safeguards could be developed.

48. The current NATO programme was not sufficient to ensure the defence of the West. The decision to level off the build-up of the forces and to concentrate on quality weapons implied freedom to use new weapons in the event of attack. The United States for their part had accepted the assumption that atomic weapons would be available. Without these weapons, the security of the NATO forces would be in jeopardy. The liberty to use these weapons as conventional ones was essential to the defence of the NATO area. This was required if our military capacity was to achieve the greatest deterrent effect.

49. The willingness to use atomic weapons whenever and wherever possible was however subject to many factors, some of which were not purely military. The United States Government intended to consult their allies and to cooperate fully with them. In fact, consultation was an important means to assure that available strength was used to best advantage. It was important, therefore, to ensure that the methods of consultation contributed to the common security. Under certain contingencies, time might not permit consultation. As far as possible, it was therefore desirable to seek understanding in advance on the best course to follow. Such agreements would also help in deterring aggression and in assuring protection if it occurred.

50. Throughout history, the more civilized peoples had depended on the greater resourcefulness which their freedom generated for their ultimate protection. If the Free World were to renounce its potential superiority in new weapons, it would abandon the very principle which had enabled it to survive. With its very existence at stake, it would be suicidal to give up atomic and thermonuclear superiority unless safeguards could be assured. If the West were to say that these weapons would be used only in retaliation and only if the Soviets started a world war, its deterrent power would disappear. The temptation to start the war, in the expectation that it would be fought on Soviet terms would be irresistible. The West must be free to use atomic weapons when this might be to its advantage; the West must be able to strike where it hurts and this involves atomic power.

51. If the West was free, able and willing to make the aggressor lose more than he was likely to win, the potential aggressor could not calculate his gains. If, on the contrary, he was assured of sanctuary status for his main assets, aggression would be encouraged. He could undertake local aggressions, concentrate his offensive means, and gradually achieve superiority. To deny him these advantages did not mean that all local wars would become general wars or that indiscriminate use of atomic weapons was contemplated. The primary goal was to prevent war. The Soviet Union had to recognize that the Free World would defend itself with all the means at its disposal. The deterrent power of the new weapons was effective only as long as the Free World retained the strength and the will to use them.

52. If the West could meet these tests, general war might be avoided. Until effective controls could be established, the course outlined above was the only hopeful one. The United States Government would continue their efforts to achieve agreement. They were exploring with complete dedication the possibilities offered by President Eisenhower's proposals but they were prepared to examine also any other approach which did not involve an increase in the peril to the free nations.

53. Mr. Dulles spoke late in the day. He was reading an obviously carefully prepared paper. His colleagues could hardly do more than note his remarks. Mr. Eden intervened briefly, however, to stress the dominating character of the problem, the special responsibilities of the countries which had done work in the atomic field and the obligation of all to be realistic. He felt that the Free Nations had the duty to go ahead in their work within the U.N. Disarmament Committee, even if one of the parties was not prepared to attend.

B. Indo-China

54. Many Foreign Ministers, in the course of their remarks, had paid homage to the gallantry of French Union forces fighting in Indo-China. Some had drawn attention to the significance of their struggle both for the free world and for NATO.

55. In closing the restricted session, M. Bidault spoke briefly on this subject. To put it in a nutshell, the problem was that France had friends all over Indo-China, and politically, she had to have forces everywhere. Laos covered half the area of France. there was Cambodia with her "whimsical" King and a 2500 km. coast-line. Militarily, French forces were overextended and weak everywhere. This explained why an old military nation which had been given so much assistance was now facing a grave and difficult moment in her history. He concluded his remarks by adding that what was happening at Dien-Bien-Phu was not a matter of indifference to NATO. Our fight against Communists was the same everywhere.

C. Marshal Juin

56. At the Council meeting on April 20th, the Netherlands representative recalled that a few weeks before Council had passed a resolution concerning Marshal Juin.²⁶ This resolution had been adopted on the understanding that the French Government would take action. He wondered whether the Secretary-General or the French Representative could give any information as to developments. M. Alphand reported that he had been instructed by M. Bidault to advise the Council that this was a matter which would be raised in a restricted session during the Ministerial Meeting. It is interesting to note that M. Bidault did not suggest that there should be any discussion concerning Marshal Juin's position or the intentions of the French government in this regard.

IV. COMMUNIQUÉ

57. A communiqué had been drafted by a Working Group which met while Foreign Ministers were in session. It was approved very quickly. (Copy is attached for convenience of reference.)

LATEST SOVIET NOTE²⁷

As if inspired by our discussion on the previous day concerning political consultation, Lord Ismay yesterday called together the Council at short notice in restricted session to consider the latest Soviet note²⁸ and the position of Marshall Juin.²⁹ I shall be dealing with the latter subject in a separate telegram.†

2. An interesting preliminary discussion took place on the latest Soviet note. The United Kingdom representative was the only one with instructions as he was able to read the statement which Mr. Eden was making in the House of Commons that same afternoon.³⁰

²⁷ Pour la première note de l'Union soviétique, voir le document 272./For the first Soviet note, see Document 272.

³⁰ Voir/See Great Britain, House of Commons, Debates, 5th Series, Volume 525, columns 2233-34.

3. The two most interesting interventions were those of the French and Turkish representatives. M. Alphand, expressing the preliminary reaction of officials of the Quai d'Orsay, said that they considered the note directed against the EDC Treaty and German participation in the defence of western Europe. What was most interesting in the note were the differences as compared with the Soviet attitude at Berlin.³¹ First, there was the inclusion of the United States in the proposed European security organization, whereas at Berlin the United States had been relegated to the position of an observer. Secondly, Communist China has now disappeared and was not even proposed for observer status. Thirdly, while at Berlin the North Atlantic Pact had been attacked, it was now acceptable to the Soviet Union to the extent that they were prepared to join the organization. This would have the effect of making NATO a Paris branch of the United Nations.

4. After Alphand had spoken Lord Ismay called attention to the last sentence in the penultimate paragraph of the Soviet note where it is stated that "the ground will be laid to prevent any part of Germany from becoming involved in military groups". Lord Ismay said that this confirmed the contention of Alphand that the note was directed primarily against German rearmament.

5. The Turkish representative in a short but thoughtful intervention said that the note should not be regarded merely as another propaganda effort; it should be taken seriously as part of a determined peace offensive. It was timed to coincide with public consternation in western countries over the horrible efficacy of the hydrogen bomb. It might be that the bomb had instilled genuine fear in the Soviet leaders and this was leading them to intensify the peace offensive. This made it all the more important for the NATO countries to work through Article II to strengthen their unity in order that they may work together effectively in the face of a real Soviet peace offensive.

6. All of the representatives who spoke said that the note should be taken seriously in spite of its preposterous character. In framing the reply to the note the three powers should have particular regard to probable public reaction. The Norwegian representative and others said they hoped a further opportunity would be given of a discussion in council so that representatives of other countries could make their views known before the three powers had made up their minds as to the main lines of their reply.

7. Accordingly it was agreed that there should be a further discussion in council after representatives had had an opportunity of obtaining instructions from their governments. After some discussion it was agreed that there should be a restricted session on Wednesday, April 7, to discuss the note further.

³¹ Les ministres des Affaires étrangères de la France, de l'Union soviétique, du Royaume-Uni et des États-Unis se sont réunis à Berlin du 25 janvier au 19 février 1954 pour discuter de la question allemande, des problèmes concernant la sécurité internationale et européenne et du Traité de l'État autrichien. C'est à l'issue de ces discussions qu'ils se sont entendus pour tenir la conférence à Genève sur la Corée et l'Indochine. Voir le document 19.

The Foreign Ministers of France, the Soviet Union, the United Kingdom and the United States met in Berlin between January 25 and February 19, 1954 to discuss the German question, problems of international and European security, and the Austrian State Treaty. These discussions resulted in agreement to hold the Geneva conference on Korea and Indochina. See Document 19.

8. Your considered views on the Soviet note and concrete suggestions as to possible points which the three powers should bear in mind in framing their reply should reach us before Wednesday morning, April 7.

TELEGRAM WA-1328

Washington, July 29, 1954

SOVIET NOTE OF THE 24TH OF JULY ON EUROPEAN SECURITY³²

At our regular weekly meeting with Hayden Raynor at the State Department yesterday, we received some information about the initial United States reactions to the Soviet note of the 24th of July, and about the plans that are being made to concert an answer to it.

2. Raynor said that since, in the opinion of the State Department, it contained nothing new and nothing that the west could accept, there was a strong temptation to reject it publicly out of hand. However, every effort was being made in Washington to resist that temptation and to leave full room for unprejudiced consideration by the three countries which have been specifically addressed, and by others, of the issues that had been raised.

3. Reading from a State Department position paper, Raynor said that the note seemed to them to be virtually a carbon copy of the Soviet note of the 31st of March. The arguments that had been used in the western reply of the 7th of May would still be applicable and valid, he thought. The immediate target of the note was clearly public opinion in France. The Soviets were trying to make some capital there from the success of the Geneva Conference in reaching a settlement on Indo-China and were trying to play on the illusion that was prevalent in some quarters in France that the Soviets and the Chinese Communists were now in a mood of sweet reasonableness. The practical objective was so to influence French public opinion that the National Assembly would reject outright the EDC Treaty before it adjourned. For a wider audience the note would serve, no doubt as the Soviets saw it, to provide general support for the peace propaganda campaign. Its longer-run objective was to separate the United States from the Allies; and as such it was the diplomatic counterpart of the "Americans go home" agitation now being conducted by the local Communists Parties in Germany and France.

³² Voir/See United States, Department of State, Bulletin, Volume XXXI, No. 795, September 20, 1954, pp. 398-401.

4. Raynor said that, according to preliminary indications, the appraisals of the note that had been made in the Foreign Office and in the Quai d'Orsay were very similar to those made in the State Department. In an interview which the United States Ambassador in Paris had with M. Mendes-France this Tuesday, the French Prime Minister said that in his opinion the note contained nothing new and would have little impact on French opinion. He did not expect that it would interfere in any way with his plans to submit the EDC Treaty to the National Assembly early next month. In fact, he admitted that he had been somewhat surprised by its routine and banal quality, since he had expected a démarche that would require more serious consideration. The Foreign Office had received the note with similar equanimity so that it would seem that there should be little difficulty in reaching agreement between the three powers on the reply to be returned. Raynor cautioned, however, that it was seldom so easy to concert a reply as it often seemed at the outset; and this optimistic forecast might be falsified if the note proved to have a more serious effect on opinion in Western Europe than M. Mendes-France anticipated in the case of France.

5. Arrangements have now been made for a working group, consisting of representatives of the three powers, to meet in London to draft a reply. Since the note would seem to be primarily addressed to Western Europe, the State Department are endeavouring to give every consideration to the views which may be expressed on the note by its European partners. With this end in view, no United States draft will be tabled; and it is expected that the working group in London will begin by considering a French draft. The State Department are also anxious that there should be a genuine consultation within the North Atlantic Council over the reply. Raynor admitted that on some similar occasions in the past consultation within the Council had been rather hurried and pro forma. He thought, however, that this had not been the case when the reply to the Soviet note of the 31st of March was being considered and hoped that you would agree that on that occasion the members of the Council had had full opportunity to express the views of their governments at an early stage in the drafting of the reply. A similar procedure would be followed in the case of the present note. Indeed, it was possible that it would come up for preliminary discussion in the Council today, the 29th of July.

NEW SOVIET NOTE

In private session on August 2 the Council gave preliminary consideration to the latest Soviet note of July 24.

2. It appeared that the United States in particular (as forecast in Washington's telegram WA-1328 of July 29) and the United Kingdom and France as well were anxious to obtain a full expression of views from other NATO members concerning the purpose and significance of the Soviet note and the considerations which should have a bearing on the content and timing of the reply.

3. It was the general opinion that the note had been rather hastily and rather clumsily prepared in order to take advantage of the political climate following the Geneva Conference, and as a final effort to prevent the ratification of the EDC Treaty. It was the universal opinion that the note contained little or nothing that is new, and that its propagandist purpose is so obvious that its impact on Western public opinion need not be taken very seriously. All speakers agreed that there was nothing in the note which would justify the Western powers undertaking a new four-power conference at the present time, and indeed it appeared to be accepted that the Soviet Union will have to give far more convincing evidence of a change of heart before Western European Governments will be willing to risk the propaganda war that a further meeting would probably entail.

4. There were no strong views concerning the timing of the reply. The big three themselves appeared to have formed no opinions on this, and none of the others had any special case to make. As to content, it appeared to be generally accepted that the reply should be brief, simple, and frank. The Netherlands suggested that it should refer to consultation among the NATO countries. Denmark, agreeing that there was nothing in the Soviet note that could be accepted, nevertheless, argued that the reply should avoid a negative tone. It would not be desirable to let it appear that the Western powers were in principle unwilling to negotiate; rather the line should be that we were ready to negotiate as soon as the Soviet Union by specific action with regard to free elections in Germany, the conclusion of an Austrian treaty not involving continued occupation, and so on, should show it is prepared to work for agreement.

5. There was no indication of when the tripartite drafting group in London were expected to produce a text. It appeared to be understood, however, that there would be further discussion in the Council as drafting proceeded or upon the basis of a tripartite text. Having received no indication of your views, we considered it unnecessary to intervene in today's discussion.³³ If you have particular comments to make on the points discussed above or on other points relating to the note or the reply, we should be grateful to receive them in the near future in order that we may put them forward when the matter comes up again.

³³ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

SOVIET NOTE OF JULY 24, 1954

1. We had not expected consideration of the Soviet Note to come for discussion in the Council so soon as we had understood from United States Embassy here that it would be discussed after tripartite working group had produced a draft. Comments on the Note coincide very closely with our impressions here.

2. The U.S.S.R. appears to have miscalculated with regard to the extent of relaxation of tension which would result from the Geneva Conference. In this connection it appears curious that the U.S.S.R. should not repeat not consider it necessary to advance any new proposals of substance. The Note may therefore have been proposed simply with the purpose of influencing sufficient votes in the French Assembly to prevent ratification of EDC. But Mendes-France seems not unduly perturbed by this.

3. If the Soviet aim was limited, we think it likely that some further Soviet attempt will be made to influence Western European opinion after this Note is rejected, as the Russians surely expect it will. It is difficult to believe any further suggestions for discussions on German unity will be forthcoming, but if EDC fails to pass the French Assembly, the situation may seem to the Russians propitious for another attempt of some sort at detaching the Bonn Government from its Western alliance.

4. We understand that the United States intends to let France and the United Kingdom take the initiative in drafting a reply and this seems wise to us. You will note the claim in the Soviet note that the Western powers have failed to make any suggestions "designed to safeguard the security of all countries in Europe" and that "not all European states have expressed their views" on the Soviet proposal. It seems particularly important in view of these claims that the Western reply should handle these points very carefully and not leave any impression that the leading Western powers are negative in their approach and that they fail to take into account the attitudes of other Western European states. Since the Soviet Note also tries to leave the impression in West European minds that "coexistence" means the abandonment of NATO and EDC by the West, the reply might also make it clear that from the Western standpoint coexistence between East and West cannot mean that the latter leaves itself defenceless while the closely integrated Soviet bloc retains its present military power.

5. We think the Netherlands suggestion that the reply should refer to consultation among the NATO powers is a good one. We are not sure, however, that the Danish suggestion should be included in the reply. We do not necessarily require specific Soviet action as "proof" of good intentions before entering negotiations since negotiations are presumably intended to lead to a conclusion of the Austrian Treaty, free elections in Germany, and so on. Rather we would need real assurances from the Soviet Government that it was prepared to negotiate on these and other matters — assurances which are not in evidence in the present note.

6. The above comments may be useful to you when this matter comes up in Council again.

SOVIET NOTES OF JULY 24 AND AUGUST 4

We were grateful to receive the views set out in your telegram, which will be most useful when this question is discussed in the Council again. We expect that a further discussion will take place before very long, almost certainly by Friday, August 13, as a result of the new Soviet note of August 4.³⁴

2. Our present information concerning this latest Soviet approach is very limited. We have learned from the United States delegation that the approach made in Washington took the form of an actual diplomatic note, and we assume that the same course was followed in London and Paris. The United Kingdom delegation has received no information from London beyond a brief summary of the principal points made by the Soviet Ambassador in London, a summary which did not even specify the form in which the approach had been made.

3. We were asked by the officer-in-charge of the Netherlands' delegation (a first-secretary dealing with political matters) for an interview to discuss the question. The interview was not particularly productive however, as neither he nor we had available a text, and both were entirely without instructions. He appeared to be concerned lest it might be difficult for the French and the British to make a firm rejection to the new proposal for a four-power meeting in the near future. While we have not yet been in touch with the French delegation, it is the preliminary view within the United Kingdom delegation that there should be no difficulty in taking such a course, as the new note provides no new suggestion of a possible basis for negotiation at such a conference. This consideration suggests the possibility that there may be still to come a third Soviet note designed to make the request for a conference more realistic by indicating some new possibility, however illusory, for agreement.

4. As the delegations to which we have spoken are without instructions, there is as yet no specific request for a Council meeting to discuss the latest note. Nevertheless, it seems to be generally accepted that such a discussion is likely to take place, and accordingly, we should be grateful to receive any views which you may have as soon as possible, particularly with regard to the question of whether or not a single reply to the two Russian notes would be the best course. We shall let you know at once if a definite date is set.³⁵

5. In our discussion with the United Kingdom delegation, they took the occasion to underline the fact that, like the United States, London had wished the Council's discussion of the note of July 24 to be as full and frank as possible. We do not know whether the French hold the same view. It occurs to us that the latest note, consisting as it does for the most part of a proposal for a four-power conference, may not be regarded by the big three in the same light, but there is certainly no evidence here to support this possibility.

SOVIET NOTES OF JULY 24 AND AUGUST 4

We have not yet seen the text of the August 4 note. The small amount of information so far available to us suggests that the Soviet Government realized that the proposal in the July 24 note for a conference of all European states, far from arousing opinion in Western Europe in its support or delaying French plans for a decision on EDC, simply fell flat because of the vagueness of the language and unoriginality of the terms.

³⁵ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

draft of a reply sent to Mr. Ford 6/8/54 a.m. K.B. W[illiamson]

2. The subsequent proposal for a Big Four meeting may have been intended in part to bolster up the first note by persuading the West that the USSR was serious in its aim of discussing European security. The Russians may also have realised that it would be more difficult for the Western powers to reject their proposal if it involved a specific invitation.

3. This will obviously make it more necessary to draft a persuasive reply which will not give the average Western European the idea that the West is not interested in negotiations. Presumably the Russians expect a refusal and will therefore be prepared to exploit it. The European security pact looks as phony to Western officials as did the "peace" campaign, but in a developed atmosphere of relaxation in Western Europe it may have the same kind of superficial appeal to the mass of the people. We therefore consider it most important that this point be given consideration in drafting the reply.

4. Our initial feeling is that one reply by the Western Powers to the two notes would be appropriate and that it should be discussed in the Council.

REPLY TO SOVIET NOTES

A report from London dated August 26 and published in the New York Times stated that a draft reply to the Soviet notes of July 24 and August 4 was in more or less final form. It would require only some drafting changes in the light of the French Assembly decision on EDC. We do not know how accurate this report is but we assume that a draft or a report of some kind will be put up to the three Governments by the working group within a few days. In view of previous consultation in NATO Council on this subject and its close connection with the general question of what happens after the defeat of EDC, we trust that the proposed reply will be fully discussed in the Council. We understand that there is a Council meeting tomorrow and this may offer an opportunity to find out the intentions of the three powers about replying to the Soviet notes. We would be grateful for whatever information you can get. We would hope to have a few days to consider the proposed reply before commenting on it for the purposes of a Council discussion. The setback to Western defence plans involved in the rejection of EDC, the strained relations between France and other powers over the Brussels discussions, the possibility of another Soviet note or some new Soviet move in Germany all seem to make it essential that a Western reply, while it should be sent shortly, should be discussed fully by all NATO powers.

DRAFT REPLY TO SOVIET NOTES

A council meeting has been called for 11:00 a.m. on Friday September 3 to give preliminary consideration to the draft reply to the two latest Soviet notes. The United Kingdom delegation here has not yet received the text but is expecting to receive it from London by teletype during the night. The United Kingdom has undertaken to produce enough copies to permit distribution at the meeting tomorrow morning.

2. While the United Kingdom recognizes that governments can not be expected to express a final view at tomorrow morning's meeting, the delegation has admitted privately that they hope to obtain agreement tomorrow for a final meeting on Monday, September 6.

3. We are asking Canada House by telephone to send us the text by telegram during the night if they are able to obtain it, in order that we may have some opportunity to look through it tomorrow morning prior to the meeting. We assume that Canada House will wish to send you the text by telegram as soon as it is available to them, but in case we receive it first, we shall certainly send it ourselves. It will be helpful if you could inform us in time for tomorrow's meeting whether it would in fact be possible for you to send us final comments in time for a meeting on Monday.³⁶ In view of the position consistently supported by the Big Three that this reply should carry the full support of NATO as a whole, the proposed timetable leaves very little time for study. We would, therefore, expect to find support from, for example, our Scandinavian, Italian, Turkish and Greek colleagues in requesting a deferment of the second meeting. If we have not heard from you by tomorrow morning, we shall not refuse to accept a meeting on Monday, September 6, to

REPLY TO SOVIET NOTE OF JULY 24 AND ORAL COMMUNICATION OF AUGUST 4

Following is text of tripartite draft reply which will be discussed in Paris tomorrow. Text begins:

H.M.G., in consultation with the United States and French Governments and other interested governments, in particular those of the NATO, have studied with close attention the Soviet Government's note of July 24 and their oral communication of August 4.

2. In these communications the Soviet Government have repeated their proposals which were fully discussed at the Berlin Conference. HMG attach great importance to European security but it cannot be usefully discussed unless the fundamental interests of all the parties concerned are safeguarded. Security in Europe cannot be brought about by the signature of a general treaty of the kind proposed by the Soviet Government. It will only result from the solution of concrete problems, of which the most pressing are those of Germany and Austria.

3. HMG note that the Soviet Government have again alleged that NATO constitutes an "aggressive military grouping". The aims of NATO are purely defensive and are in entire conformity with the charter of the United Nations. It was set up to enable the western democracies to defend themselves against the threat created by the establishment since 1945 of a heavily armed Soviet grouping in Eastern Europe. It now forms a free association of likeminded states, with other than purely military ties. There can be no question either of modifying NATO or of abandoning it.

4. The association of the German Federal Republic with other peace-loving states of Western Europe in a defensive system long after the rearming of Eastern Germany, far from constituting a threat to European security, is intended to prevent any nation from having independent recourse to the threat or use of force. This is the best guarantee for the security of all Germany's neighbours, of Germany herself and of Europe as a whole.

5. Neither in their note of July 24 nor in their oral communication of August 4 have the Soviet Government made any new proposals for a solution of the German problem. Under the proposed Soviet security treaty the present division of Germany would be maintained contrary to the profound desire of the German people. HMG, on the other hand, believe that Germany must be reunited in freedom at the earliest possible moment and that this can only be achieved by holding free elections throughout Germany under international supervision. HMG remain prepared to negotiate on the basis of the practical plan put forward by the three western powers at the Berlin Conference for the holding of elections.

6. The simplest step towards the promotion of European security remains however an early settlement of the Austrian question. In this connection HMG must once again express the view that conclusion of an Austrian Treaty should not, as proposed by the Soviet Government, be dependent upon an all-European settlement, upon a German Peace Treaty, or upon any other matter extraneous to the Austrian Treaty. At Berlin HMG offered, contingent upon prompt Soviet acceptance, to accept the Soviet text of all the previously unagreed articles in the Austrian State Treaty. HMG are prepared to renew that offer now. If the Soviet Government will sign the Treaty in these terms, agreement could thus be reached at once to restore to Austria the freedom and independence which have been promised to her since 1943.

7. Agreement on the question of disarmament would undoubtedly help to create the necessary atmosphere in which the problem of European security could usefully be discussed. HMG seek the abolition of the use, possession and manufacture of all atomic, hydrogen and other weapons of mass destruction, within a system which would include provisions for simultaneous and major reductions in conventional armaments and armed forces to levels to be agreed, the whole programme to be carried out in accordance with an agreed timetable and under effective supervision and control. During the recent discussions in the United Nations sub-committee HMG put forward proposals which could have led to progress. Although the Soviet Government were not then willing to consider these proposals, HMG will continue to seek an acceptable and effective agreement and hope that the Soviet Government will contribute to this end.

8. These are the problems to which practical agreed solution must be found if there is to be genuine security in Europe. Further international discussion of them would only be useful if there is a better prospect of finding solutions than was revealed in the exhaustive discussions at the Berlin Conference or than is now revealed in the latest Soviet communications. Her Majesty's Government remain determined to do all in their power to make progress on these problems. They hope that the Soviet Government will contribute to such progress by:

(a) Signing the Austrian State Treaty with the Soviet text of the previously unagreed articles, an offer made at the Berlin Conference by the United Kingdom, United States, France and Austria which HMG now renew;

(b) Agreeing to free elections on the basis proposed by HMG at Berlin as the essential first step towards German reunification in freedom.

If progress could be made in this way, HMG would then be prepared to agree to the convocation of a meeting of the Foreign Ministers of the United Kingdom, France, USA, and USSR to complete the action on these problems and then to consider the remaining aspects of European security. HMG sincerely hope that meanwhile the disarmament discussions can be brought to a successful conclusion. Text ends.

REPLY TO SOVIET NOTES

We have no suggestions for change in the draft reply. It strikes an admirable balance between a firm statement of Western policy and willingness to negotiate with the Soviet Union at a four power conference, under reasonable conditions. The note focuses attention on the two points concerning which Soviet intransigence is most clearly evident. This seems to us to be the most effective way of replying both to the lengthy and vague Soviet note of July 24 and to the specific suggestion for a meeting made on August 4.

2. We would expect this note to be satisfactory to all NATO members. However, in any general discussion which may take place about the note and about current Soviet policy it may be useful for you to have some indication of our thinking on the subject since the rejection of EDC.

3. In the first place it seemed to us that the reply offered a good opportunity for a clear statement of Western policy which would put the defeat of EDC in its proper perspective and underline the fundamental unity between France, the United Kingdom and the United States as well as the other NATO powers.

4. In our telegram No. 513 of August 4 we stressed the fact that the reply should not appear too negative. I think that the draft now prepared is positive in tone and goes as far as possible to meet the Soviet suggestion for a meeting. We do not think that by adopting as positive an attitude as possible to the suggestion of a four power meeting the Western powers will delay agreement of an alternative to EDC. It will inevitably take some time to work out any method of bringing Germany into the Western camp with adequate guarantees against a revival of German militarism. It would however be unwise to get into a position where the Western powers had to deal at the same time with the Soviet Union in a four power conference and with Western Germany in negotiations concerning German rearmament and the restoration of German sovereignty.

5. A completely negative note from the Western powers would have left the governments concerned open to the criticism that the West objected in principle to negotiating with the Soviet Union and that they were afraid that they could not maintain a common front at a four power conference.

6. The Austrians in particular would probably not have been very happy with a Western note which implied that there could be no question of meeting with the Russians until Germany was brought into NATO or into some other defence system comparable to EDC. By giving the Austrian question a prominent position in the note the three powers have dealt very effectively with this consideration.

7. The Soviet Union may intend to advance some new statements about Germany and European security at the time the General Assembly of the United Nations starts its fall session. The Western powers could moderate the propaganda effect of any such move by making it clear as they do in the note that they are willing to confer with the Soviet Union under certain specified circumstances and that they await some indication of the possibility of fruitful negotiation.

8. At the moment it seems likely that the Soviet Union is not planning any real change in its European policies and that it will not make any major move while there is the possibility that a fate similar to that of EDC will overcome any other such scheme put forward by the Western powers.

9. We cannot assume, however, that these policies are unalterable and that the Russians might not make an offer to Bonn, at least superficially attractive, to withdraw Soviet forces from Eastern Germany and accept free elections in return for a guarantee that Germany would not enter NATO. This could bring overwhelming popular support in Germany and place the Western powers in an awkward predicament. Therefore nothing should be allowed to delay the devising of a satisfactory plan to obtain a German defence contribution. Another consideration to be kept in mind is the possibility that the Soviet Union wished to stabilize the situation in the Far East by ending the war in Indochina before making any changes in its European policies.

10. The only problem that remains to be solved therefore is that of the timing of the note. It could be argued that it would be best to defer the reply until a firm date has been set for the NATO Council meeting which is to deal with the German problem, and that it could then be decided whether it would be best to send the reply immediately or to defer it until the Council could consider it in the light of their discussion of the German problem. On the other hand, it is important to reassert the unity of the NATO allies precisely at the moment when the alliance is undergoing some strain, and this we presume to be the reason for the urgency of the three power action.

11. While we do not feel strongly about the question of timing, we might raise this question and ask if consideration had been given to the arguments in favour of postponing a reply.

DRAFT REPLY TO SOVIET NOTES

We have only one comment to make on the wording of the draft note. On the assumption that the Western Powers would not want to include disarmament among topics to be discussed at a Four-Power meeting, it might be preferable to make that point quite clear by changing the last sentence in the note to read "Her Majesty's Government sincerely hope that meanwhile the disarmament discussions in the United Nations can be brought to a successful conclusion".

REPLY TO SOVIET NOTES

In informal session on September 7, the Council exchanged views on the draft reply to the two recent Soviet notes. The drafting powers were universally congratulated on an excellent document, and no point of substance was challenged. There were, however, certain suggestions on points of detail.

2. Belgium suggested the addition of a phrase in the sentence immediately following sub-paragraph (b) of paragraph 8. The phrase would be designed to take account of the suggestion in the Soviet note of July 24 for a conference of all European states, on the ground that the present phrasing related only to the suggestion in the note of August 4 for a Big Four Conference. For the opening phrase of this sentence as it now stands ("if progress could be made in this way") Italy suggested the substitution of the following phrase: "If satisfactory assurance were given". Luxembourg referred to the final sentence of paragraph 3 in the French text, pointing out that the language might cause embarrassment in relation to possible future changes in NATO membership. This led the United Kingdom to observe that it was already planning to change this sentence to read "there could [be] no question either of modifying or of abandoning this conception". It was agreed that this change, applied equally to the French text, would meet the Luxembourg point.

3. Turkey suggested that there might be advantage in deferring the reply until there had been substantial progress in the matter of arranging for a German defence contribution. In reply, it was argued by the United States and the United Kingdom that one of the prime considerations governing the proposed timing was the conviction that a firm reassurance to the USSR of continuing unity among the Western powers would be of great advantage at the present time in combatting the consequence of the recent EDC developments.

4. We made a statement along the lines of your telegram which incidentally supported the United States and United Kingdom point reported in our previous paragraph.

SOVIET ATTITUDE TOWARDS REARMING OF WEST GERMANY

Now that the Western note of September 10³⁷ has been delivered to the Soviet Government it is important to consider what the next Soviet move concerning Germany may be. The firm refusal of the United Kingdom, France and the United States to attend a foreign power meeting unless the Soviet Union agrees to sign a peace treaty for Austria and accept free elections as the first step in Germany, and the immediate steps taken in the West after the defeat of E.D.C. to find an alternative defence scheme, have presented the Soviet Government with clear proof that neither the course of events in France nor the post Geneva blandishments of Soviet diplomacy in Europe have shaken the resolve of the Western Governments to pursue their basic objective of granting sovereignty to West Germany and incorporating German defence measures in some kind of Western defence system. Although the Soviet Government will do what it can to undermine these governments within their own countries it can hardly hope, in spite of the uncertainties of French and German opinion, that this will provide a very sure way of halting West German rearmament. The Soviet Government must face the possibility that, by aiming at something less ambitious than E.D.C. and by learning from the E.D.C. experience just how French public opinion stands, the Western powers may agree within a few months on a means of rearming West Germany and start putting that policy into effect. The important question for the Western nations is whether the Soviet Union, if faced shortly with a workable scheme for German rearmament which only the Communists in France would oppose this time, will choose to regard this as serious provocation by the West and make some move, other than a propaganda one, to underline this fact.

2. Any argument that the Soviet Government will regard final agreement on German rearmament as seriously provocative would have to rest primarily on the propaganda statements made in Moscow. There have, of course, been many statements of this kind, claiming that rearmament of West Germany was tantamount to unleashing another world war. The latest of these, published in Moscow on September 9, the day before the Western note was delivered, stated that remilitarization of Germany in any form would enormously increase the chances of a third world war. Although we do not yet have the text of this statement, which was issued by the Foreign Ministry and published in Pravda, it seems clear that the Soviet Government had no new policies to put forward and no new threats to utter but felt the need of another public statement on the subject to keep its views before the public in the West. These statements are obviously intended not to jolt Western Governments by an ultimatum but to increase apprehension and resentment among groups in Western countries opposing any kind of German rearmament who see in Soviet protests about Western provocation one more reason for not allowing the West Germans to have any army under any conditions.

3. The argument against the possibility of the Soviet Union's regarding the rearmament of Western Germany as serious provocation by the West is based on a number of assumptions about Soviet foreign policy in general. Without repeating these assumptions we can note certain points about the Soviet attitude towards Germany which are relevant to the question posed in this memorandum:

(1) From the standpoint of Soviet interests E.D.C. was a greater threat than any scheme which the West is likely to find to replace it,³⁸ and the Soviet Government did not deliver any serious ultimatum to the Western powers on this subject although it did everything it could to defeat the project without a specific threat of war. It might be argued that the Soviet Government was sure that the treaty would never be ratified and saw no need for an ultimatum. This argument, however, assumes much greater confidence on the part of the Soviet Government in its own foresight than that Government probably has when its vital interests are at stake. Although the difficulties in putting E.D.C. into effect were obvious from the beginning, the Soviet Government also knew that in spite of disagreements among Western governments and the pressures of public opinion, Western nations were, as the formation of NATO and collective action in Korea showed, capable of evolving effective defence measures, even on short notice; if the Soviet Government really

³⁸ Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Not necessarily [J. Léger]

felt that any rearmament of Western Germany was tantamount to aggression by the West it is hard to believe that it would not have said this much earlier in such a way that the Western nations could not misunderstand.

(2) At this late date, it is hard to think of any kind of ultimatum on the subject of German rearmament which the West would not simply have to reject. A rejection would face the Soviet Union with a humiliating loss of face or with the necessity of taking some action which would almost certainly lead to war. The course of Soviet policy since Stalin's death argues against any intention on the part of the Soviet Government to provoke such a crisis.

(3) If the Western reply to recent Soviet notes had been combined with approval of E.D.C. by the French Assembly, this rebuff to Soviet policy might have provoked some Soviet gesture as an assertion of strength. The actual course of events has, however, been embarrassing to the Western nations instead and the Soviet Government, while it cannot claim to have manipulated more than a few of the strings in the E.D.C. drama, is taking as much of the credit as possible for the final French decision. While exploiting the propaganda advantage by vociferous propaganda campaigns about German rearmament, the Soviet Government does not likely feel the need of any other action at present to maintain Soviet prestige.

(4) From a purely military standpoint it is hard to believe that the Soviet Government would be very much worried about the level of rearmament Western Germany is likely to achieve within a Western defence system in the next few years.³⁹ It is probably much more interested in the extent to which Western Germany enters politically and economically into the Western world and is rendered immune to Soviet offers of a bargain on reunification under terms contrary to Western interests. Whatever substitute is found for E.D.C., it seems likely that Western Germany will be a freer agent than under the terms of that treaty. This is a situation which the Soviet Union might well be able to exploit. The Soviet Government probably expects Western Germany to be rearmed shortly but hopes that this process will be accompanied by as much bad feeling, suspicion and regret among Western Governments and between these governments and the people they represent as possible. The ground would then be well prepared for a Soviet (or an East German) direct approach to Bonn on the subject of German unification and of the position of a unified Germany among the European nations. The Soviet Government has probably given up hope of changing the course of Western policy by negotiation and is now concentrating on making the most of the weak points inherent in that policy even after Western Germany has been granted full sovereignty and is formally associated with the West in its defence measures. Until that happens the Soviet Government will probably devote its main effort to propaganda about German rearmament since a complete breakdown in Western plans would be even better than the uneasy situation described above.⁴⁰

SOVIET NOTE OF OCTOBER 23 TO WESTERN POWERS

The latest Soviet note⁴¹ to the Western Powers on Germany, Austria and European security simply carries forward the theme of "more discussion" which the Soviet Government has developed since the deadlock on European questions at the Berlin Conference. It calls for a Four-Power meeting this month to discuss the unification of Germany, the holding of free elections in that country, the withdrawal of occupation troops from Germany and collective security in Europe. It also calls for a conference in Vienna of the ambassadors of the Four Powers and Austrian representatives to consider "remaining unsettled questions connected with the conclusion of this treaty (the State Treaty) with Austria". Examination of the text of the Soviet note does not reveal any Soviet intention to meet either of the conditions (agreement to genuinely free elections in Germany and the signing of a State Treaty for Austria) which the Western Powers laid down in their note of September 10 as prerequisites for further Four-Power meetings.

2. The note not only fails to give any indication of a real change in Soviet policy but also repeats, as dogmatically as in previous communications, the assertions that the NATO powers constitute an aggressive military bloc threatening the Soviet Union and that no military bloc exists in Eastern Europe.

3. Except for the references to the agreements among the Western Powers in London and to the Soviet disarmament proposal in the United Nations, the note might have been drafted and sent in mid-September, shortly after the last Western note was sent to the Soviet Government. The only apparent reason why the note was not sent earlier is that the much publicized Vyshinsky "acceptance" of the Anglo-French disarmament proposals and the subsequent agreement among the Four Powers on procedure for further disarmament discussions could be used to support proposals for another conference on Germany. The Soviet note of October 23 makes the most of these possibilities in claiming that "it is impossible however, at one and the same time to propose a general reduction of armaments and to carry out remilitarization of Western Germany. Such actions are incompatible". The note carried forward the disarmament theme by proposing agreement on the "size, disposition and armament of all types of German police in Eastern and Western Germany," and by stating that it is known that East Germany has no objection to "verification on the spot of the actual situation at the present time".

⁴¹ Voir/See United States, Department of State, Bulletin, Volume XXXI, No. 807, December 13, 1954, pp. 902-905.

4. Although developments in the field of disarmament provide a useful means of building up the propaganda appeal of the note, particularly in France, one still wonders why the Soviet Government did not take some initiative towards a Four-Power conference shortly after the defeat of EDC and before the London agreements. The note of October 23 points out that agreement on German elections at the Berlin Conference was "prevented first of all by plans for creating the EDC". The defeat of EDC "opened possibilities" and the Soviet Government, says the note, "expresses its readiness again to consider, taking into account the aforementioned new circumstances", the Western proposals for free elections made at the Berlin Conference. The note goes on to describe the London agreements as being every bit as bad as EDC, however. The implication of these statements, judged by the preceding ones, would seem to be that, again, agreement on Germany is not likely while the West pursues these schemes of West German rearmament. This implication, if spelled out, would weaken the Soviet proposal for a conference, however, and the note, which is not very closely reasoned or imaginatively drafted in any case, goes on to other arguments in spite of these internal contradictions.

5. So far as future Soviet policy towards Germany is concerned, the present note, like other Soviet pronouncements, manages to face both ways. The note warns that "if matters reach the point of reestablishment of German militarism and involvement of Western Germany in aggressive military groupings, then the German nation for a long time will remain torn in two and from a remilitarized Western Germany there will be created a direct threat to peace in Europe". In comparison with previous Soviet utterances, this statement is neither new nor extreme. It gives no hint of what the Soviet Union intends to do in the face of such conditions. At the same time if the eventual Soviet reaction is towards a "hard" line, this statement and many others like it will be brought forward as evidence that the Soviet Government gave the West adequate warning that it would not take West German rearmament lightly.

6. The note does, on the other hand, leave the door open for friendly moves towards improved Soviet-West German relations. It carefully avoids any identification with the language of East German Communism and refers to the German problem from the lofty standpoint of one who is depressed and alarmed by the spectacle of a nation "torn into two parts opposing each other". It does not commit the Soviet Government on the delicate question of whether or not the present government in Bonn (and the people who support it in its present foreign policies) are out-and-out warmongers. Without ever being precise, it speaks more in the future tense of the possibilities of West Germany falling into the hands of militarists. To this contrived ambiguity we must add the statements of Mr. Molotov in Berlin on October 6 about the necessity of "steps aiming at a rapprochement between East and West Germany" and the particularly interesting statement about relations between the Soviet Union and the German Federal Republic:

"There is . . .".⁴²

7. The note of October 23 seems intended, therefore, to serve two main purposes:

(1) to provide those in Western Europe who will oppose ratification of the London and Paris agreements with a more up to date version of the standing Soviet offer "to negotiate" which they can use in mustering a campaign similar to that used against EDC,

(2) to hold the line on Germany and Austria while the "peace offensive" in other fields probes Western weaknesses and extends Soviet prestige in general and Soviet influence on particular countries.

8. I think we can conclude, therefore, that the Soviet authorities are more or less reconciled to the rearmament of the Federal Republic and its association with the West, and are not prepared either to react strongly against it or to make great sacrifices to prevent it, though, of course, they will probably continue to exploit whatever propaganda possibilities exist for creating suspicion and disunity in the West on this issue. Soviet diplomacy is likely, however, in my opinion, to concentrate more on the West Germans than on the French and British and, as I suggested some weeks ago, will likely in due course take the form of an attempt to "normalise" relations between the Soviet Union and the Federal Republic as a preliminary to more active direct diplomacy in Bonn with the aim of weakening German attachment to the West.

WESTERN REPLY TO SOVIET NOTE OF OCTOBER 3

The Foreign Office do not appear to attach any great significance to Adenauer's statement in Washington on the subject of an eventual agreement with the USSR, and regard it as having been made primarily for domestic consumption in Germany, without prejudice to the Chancellor's firm intention of completing the arrangements agreed on in Paris before considering any further discussions with the Russians.

Hancock of the Foreign Office tells us that the working party here has not yet started the actual drafting of the reply to the Soviet note, and are still working on principles and tactics. He said that this time the drafting would probably take place at a later stage. After preliminary consultations with the Germans and Austrians, the general questions of substance and timing could be discussed in the NATO Council next week.

The limiting factor on timing is the proposal in the Soviet note for a four-power meeting in November. In view of this, it was the opinion of the State Department, with which the Foreign Office have concurred, that the western replies should be handed in before the end of the month. If the operation is carried out as planned, however, drafting would begin after the NATO Council discussion next week, and there should still be ample opportunity for final form.

As you probably know, it had been suggested that it might be helpful to the Austrians if the Austrian section of the reply were dealt with separately, and in advance of the reply on Germany. We understand from Hancock, however, that the Foreign Office have never been enthusiastic about this idea, and that it has now been dropped. As he pointed out, the references to the Austrian problem will probably strike the only "positive" note in the western replies, and if only for this reason the two questions should be handled together.

On substance, so far as Germany is concerned, the intention is to put off any meeting with the Russians until after ratification of the Paris Agreements. Hancock's own idea is that the replies should simply point out that the Soviet note still contains no indications of how the Russians intend to put into effect the agreed principle of free German elections, and that it is difficult to see what basis there would be for further discussions until some clarification on this point has been received. On Austria, he thinks the reply might offer to accept the Soviet proposal for a meeting of ambassadors on the assumption that this was for the purpose of signing the agreed treaty.

WESTERN REPLY TO SOVIET NOTE

We understand from telegram under reference that a discussion on the general substance and timing of the Western reply to the Soviet note might be held in the Council this week. The following comments are for your guidance and to be used at your discretion in such a discussion.

2. The Soviet note of October 23 seems designed to provide a more up to date version of the standing Soviet offer to "negotiate" which can be used by those who will oppose ratification of the Paris agreements, and to hold the line on Germany and Austria while the "peace offensive" in other fields probes Western weaknesses and extends Soviet prestige in general and Soviet influence on particular countries. It seems clear that the Soviet authorities are more or less reconciled to the rearmament of the Federal Republic and its association with the West and are not prepared either to react strongly against it to make great sacrifices to prevent it. In due course the Soviet Government will likely make an attempt to "normalise" relations between the Soviet Union and the Federal Republic as a preliminary to more active direct diplomacy in Bonn with the aim of weakening German attachment to the West.

3. In view of this possible new direction in Soviet policy we were interested in the statements made in the United States by Adenauer and Hallstein about negotiations with the Soviet Union. Our Embassy in Bonn has reported the comment of an official in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs that the Chancellor had in mind the "helpful effect which such a statement might have on public opinion in this country (West Germany) in meeting S.P.D. demands for four power talks". We have also noted press reports about a statement made by M. Mendes-France on November 3. One report in the New York Times on November 5 stated that he had said that negotiations with Moscow could move "parallel" with the ratifications, but this report does not seem too reliable since other reports of the same statement indicate that he merely said that negotiation (after ratification) would not be incompatible with the nature of the agreements being ratified. We would be interested in the views on this point expressed by the French representative.

4. Since the Western reply can hardly wait until all ratifications are completed, we see no reason why it should not be sent towards the end of this month as planned. Apart from noting the considerations already mentioned in the September 10 Western note, the draft might also point out that, since then, NATO powers have expressed approval of the agreements reached in London and Paris and in fact have associated themselves with the Three-Power Declaration on Germany and Berlin, thus answering earlier Soviet suggestions that the three leading Western powers made declarations on European security which were not necessarily supported by the other Western powers. However, it is possibly more important than in the past to take into consideration German public opinion and we think the reply should be couched in such a way that it could not be used by Dr. Adenauer's opponents to increase his difficulties with ratification.

5. We hope that we will have an opportunity to see the draft of the proposed reply before it comes up for discussion in the Council, when we may be able to give you more detailed comments.

WESTERN REPLY TO SOVIET NOTES OF OCTOBER 23 AND NOVEMBER 14⁴³

We understand from London that the working group in London will consider the latest Soviet note as well as the one sent on October 23. Both notes will probably be answered in one communication. There will be draft reply to either Soviet note available for tomorrow's Council discussion but we understand that the representatives of the three Western powers will give a general outline of their proposed reply.

2. The comments we made on Soviet policy in our telegram No. 833 of November 9 seem applicable to the November 14 note also. This latest note switches over to the other main theme of Soviet propaganda, that of general European security. It does not use any more threatening language about the consequences of West German rearmament than used in previous notes.

3. We assume that although several Western statesmen have recently indicated that they might be prepared to meet with the Soviet Government after the ratification of the London and Paris agreements there will be no direct reference to this timing in the Western reply. It might be possible to say that if the Soviet Union can give some concrete evidence of its desire to negotiate seriously with the West on the two points mentioned in the Western note of September 10 and if there is real progress made in the related field of disarmament through the Disarmament Commission it might be possible for the Western Powers to agree that a Four-Power conference was desirable.

4. We assume that there will be some discussion about the nature of the replies which might be made by European members of NATO apart from the United Kingdom and France to the Soviet note of November 14. This is not a question concerning which we need give much advice. If it seems appropriate to express any opinion, you might point out that the latest Soviet proposal for an all-European security pact can be answered most effectively by pointing to the fact that European unity was destroyed when the Soviet Union organized a Communist political and military bloc of nations in Eastern Europe and to the fact that all the general guarantees for peaceful settlement of disputes and collective action against aggression are already contained in the United Nations charter.

NATO COUNCIL MEETING — NOVEMBER 17

The Council met in private session this morning. The main question discussed was the reply to the two Soviet notes.

2. The situation as described by the United States, United Kingdom and French representatives now stands as follows. The Tripartite Working Group in London met yesterday afternoon to discuss the broad outlines of the western approach. It is intended that the replies to the October 23 and the November 14 notes will be incorporated in one document. Once it is completed, the draft reply will be circulated to the other NATO countries for their comments. It would then be for the other nine NATO powers which have received the Soviet note to decide whether they wish to reply in identical terms or not.

3. The Norwegian representative in general comments on the November 14 note said that it does not contain any new element, and that the fact that it has been sent to a large group of European countries does not in itself alter the situation. He argued strongly in favour of co-ordinating the contents of the replies to be sent by the nine NATO countries concerned, in order to forestall any attempt by the U.S.S.R. to exploit slight differences for propaganda purposes. The Italian representative supported this view, and suggested that the various replies should merely reproduce the relevant part of the three powers' note. The Dutch representative thought that identical replies would be the ideal solution but this presupposes that the draft reply prepared by the Working Group will be circulated to the governments concerned. The Chairman also expressed his agreement with this procedure, and it was then generally accepted that the various replies should be couched in identical terms. The United Kingdom representative thought it important for the London Working Group to know that this was the general desire.

4. As to the time-schedule, the United States and United Kingdom representatives said that they hoped the text of the draft reply would be available towards the end of the week, but they could give no definite assurances at this stage. The French representative stated that he had just received the paper on "basic directives" which the London group is now studying, and he offered to circulate it to the various delegations. This was immediately accepted, and the NATO Secretariat undertook to circulate this document either this afternoon or tomorrow. We shall cable this text to you as soon as available.

5. It was finally agreed that Council will meet again on Monday at 3:00 p.m. to discuss the matter further. By that time it is hoped that the text of the draft reply will be available.

6. As Canada is not a recipient of the latest Soviet note which is more the concern of the European members of NATO, we did not think it opportune for us to make any statement at this stage. You may be interested to know that the Portuguese representative told us in private that his Foreign Office thinks that Portugal has been omitted from the Soviet list because they do not maintain diplomatic relations with the U.S.S.R.

7. The Chairman asked whether anything was known about Finland's reaction to the Soviet note, but no information was volunteered by any representative. With regard to Sweden's reaction, the Danish representative said that he had heard from reliable sources that Sweden intends to delay her reply till after the reply of the NATO powers had been made. As the latter will be negative, the Swedes will then be in a position to say that no action was required on their part as the Soviet initiative had found no support.

REPLY TO SOVIET NOTES

Following is the text of communication to NATO Council from London Tripartite Working Group referred to in paragraph 4 of our telegram under reference:

Text begins:

1. "The Soviet notes of 23rd October and 13th November have the same object, namely to postpone and, if possible, prevent plans for Western European integration and in particular the ratification of the Paris Agreements. Indeed, this object is specifically stated in para 22 of the second note.

Neither note contains anything new except proposals for conferences at stated times. The note of 23rd October shows no advance on the previous Soviet attitude regarding the solution of the German and Austrian problems. The note of 13th November simply repeats Mr. Molotov's old proposals on European security.

The note of 13th November provides a good illustration of the Soviet method of dealing in generalisations and postponing particular issues. The western powers have always favoured the opposite approach, viz., the solution of concrete problems (particularly the German and Austrian problems), thus leading to a general relaxation of international tension.

It seems legitimate to draw the following conclusions:

(a) The note is designed less to induce governments to agree to negotiations before ratification than to influence public opinion against ratification;

(b) The door is left open for discussions after ratification;

(c) Despite refusal of the Western European Governments, the Soviet Union may nevertheless hold a conference of Eastern European states perhaps to coincide with the debates in the Bundestag and the National Assembly.

2. Our first purpose is to secure ratification of the Paris Agreements and their entry into force must not be deflected.

According to our present thinking a reply should contain the following:

(a) A rebuttal of the Soviet attacks on the Paris Agreements, NATO, and European co-operation generally; and a restatement of our attitude on European security as given in our note of 7th May;

(b) On Germany and Austria, a request for elucidation of Soviet intentions, perhaps coupled with a renewal of the offer made in the Allied note of 10th September to proceed to the immediate signature of the Austrian Treaty;

(c) A conclusion which, while making it clear that the essential basis for a useful conference does not at present exist, would leave the door open for the future.

3. As regards the timing of the tripartite reply, it would seem best to send it sometime in the last week of November. The Soviet Government has proposed a four-power meeting during November and a general European meeting on 29th November. It would therefore probably be right to send in our reply before the latter date.

We will communicate the full text of our proposed reply as soon as possible to the Council.

We should welcome the views of the NATO Governments and hope these will be in line with our own." Text ends.

2. There seems to be little information contained in this text that is not already available to you. We would appreciate, however, receiving any additional comments you may wish to make in time for Monday's meeting.

REPLY TO SOVIET NOTES

Until we see the draft text of the reply there are few additional comments we can make.

2. With regard to paragraph 7 of your telegram 997 you will now have received copies of telegram No. 37 from Stockholm† and No. 18 from Helsinki.† You may pass the substance of these reports on to the Council meeting if you think fit.

3. It now seems very likely that there will be strong governmental and public pressure in France, Germany, the U.K. and possibly other West European countries for negotiations of some sort with the Russians after ratification of the Paris accords. We were much impressed here by the seeming determination of Mendes-France not to let the Soviet notes interfere with ratification. At the same time the French advanced very cogent arguments in favour of not losing the initiative to the Russians in this battle which they recognise as primarily engaged in the field of propaganda but which could have an unfortunate effect in time on the peoples of Western Europe if not countered in an imaginative and positive fashion.

4. The above is for your own information but it does seem to underline the importance of avoiding a purely negative reply to the Soviet notes. We may have more specific comments to make when the draft text of the reply becomes available.

REPLY TO SOVIET NOTES

We will send you in a following telegram a summary of the discussions that took place today in private session of the Council on this matter. Following, however, is the text of the draft reply to Soviet notes of October 23 and November 13, submitted to Council by the United States, United Kingdom and French Governments.

Text begins:

“Her Majesty’s Government, in consultation with the United States and French Governments, with the other NATO Governments and also with the Austrian and German Federal Governments, have considered the note of October 23 in which the Soviet Government proposed a meeting of the Foreign Ministers of the four powers in November. They have at the same time, in consultation with the interested governments, considered the Soviet Government’s note of November 13 proposing a conference about collective security in Europe.

2. Here Majesty’s Government are disappointed to find that, except for a suggestion for the hurried convocation of a European conference on November 29, neither of the Soviet notes contains any new proposal, whether on Germany, Austria or European security, which has not already been considered by the Western powers at the Berlin conference.

3. Both notes seem clearly intended to discredit and disrupt Western plans for the organisation of Europe. It has been the consistent policy of the Soviet Government since 1945 to attack all such plans, including those aimed at restoring normal conditions following the war. This was the case in 1947 over the Marshall Plan; in 1948 over German currency reform and the conclusion of the Brussels Treaty; in 1949 when NATO was created and the German Federal Government was formed on the basis of truly free elections, in 1950 when the European coal and steel community was set up; and 1952 when the European Defence Community Treaty was elaborated; and in 1954 when it appeared that the occupation régime in the German Federal Republic was to be terminated at an early date.

4. The association which is being built up by the Western nations is based on their common civilisation and traditions and is far broader in its scope and significance than a purely military alliance. The achievement in the countries of Western Europe of a close union in all fields is a deeply rooted aspiration of their peoples. It is a development of great importance in the history of Europe and is gaining in strength and purpose. By settling old rivalries and forming new ties it will promote the cause of peace in a region which in the past has given birth to so many wars.

5. Since the end of the war rearmament in the countries of the Soviet bloc, including Eastern Germany, has been massive and unrestricted. The Western powers have been compelled to unite for their own defence and protection against this threat. Under the Paris agreements, however, they have of their own free will accepted a system of controls, limitations and prohibitions to be applied to their forces and armaments. This system is designed to prevent any member nation from having independent recourse to the threat or use of force. Her Majesty’s Government are not aware of any comparable measures taken on the Soviet side to reduce international tension and lessen the feeling of insecurity.

6. The Soviet note of November 13 is openly and explicitly aimed at delaying or preventing the ratification of the Paris agreements. Her Majesty's Government for their part are resolved to bring the Paris agreements into force as soon as possible and they do not intend to be deflected from this course. Her Majesty's Government do not believe that the cause of European security can be served by the destruction of defensive associations between states inspired by the ideal of a common civilisation. It would in no sense further security to replace such associations by new organisations which would leave fundamental divergences unresolved and would thus constitute no more than a deceptive facade. Her Majesty's Government are convinced that the Paris agreements provide the basis for the solution of some of the most difficult problems confronting Europe and that far from making the question of European security more difficult to solve they will serve its promotion and contribute to the cause of peace.

7. As regards Germany, Her Majesty's Government have noted with satisfaction that the Soviet Government fully share their view that a settlement of the German problem is of decisive importance for ensuring security in Europe. In previous notes, Her Majesty's Government have emphasized that free all-German elections are the essential first step in the process of German reunification in freedom. In its note of October 23 the Soviet Government has given no indication of its view on this point nor of its attitude towards the practical plan for the holding of early elections, which was put forward by the Governments of France, the United States and the United Kingdom at the Berlin conference. Nor has the Soviet Government advanced specific alternative proposals. Her Majesty's Government would welcome a more precise indication of any concrete proposal which the Soviet Government may now have to make concerning both the timing and the nature of the free all-German elections which the Soviet Government itself declares essential for the re-establishment of a united Germany. The Soviet Government states in its note that in such elections the German people must have the possibility of expressing their free will. In the absence of specific proposals as to how the Soviet Government would provide the German people with such an opportunity, Her Majesty's Government must look to the elections recently held in the Soviet zone of Germany as their only source of information. The denial of any free choice to the East German voters on that occasion taken together with the contents of the Soviet note, appear to indicate that the Soviet Government has not changed the position which it took at the Berlin conference on these basic questions.

8. As regards Austria, Her Majesty's Government can see no justification for the continued denial to that country of the freedom and independence promised her by the four powers in the Moscow Declaration of 1943. The Governments of the United Kingdom, United States and France have expressed themselves ready to sign the Austrian State Treaty with the Soviet text of the previously unagreed articles. The Austrian Government for their part made it plain at the Berlin conference that they concurred in this view, and this remains their position. There should therefore be no further obstacle in the way of the signature of the treaty and the termination of the occupation and the withdrawal of all foreign forces as prescribed therein. Her Majesty's Government note with disappointment that the Soviet Government nonetheless propose a meeting at Vienna to "consider the remaining unsettioned questions relating to the draft state treaty and other questions connected with the conclusion of this treaty". Her Majesty's Government are at a loss as to the nature of the questions referred to by the Soviet Government. Her Majesty's Government for their part hereby renew the proposal in their note of September 10 to proceed to the immediate signature of the Austrian State Treaty.

9. Her Majesty's Government have on many occasions given proof of their desire to settle questions in dispute by negotiations conducted in a spirit of mutual respect for the essential interests of all the participants. They remain convinced that this is the best way of promoting the cause of peace. This cause would be ill served by a conference ending in failure. In order that negotiations may be undertaken with a reasonable prospect of success, they consider it necessary that the essential basis of agreement should have been carefully prepared and established in advance. The essential basis for a useful conference whether on Germany and Austria or on European security does not, in their view, at present exist. It is for this reason that they desire early clarification from the Soviet Government of its views on the specific problems of Germany and Austria.

10. Accordingly, Her Majesty's Government propose the following programme:

(1) Clarification by the Soviet Government of its position regarding the specific points referred to above relating to the German and Austrian problems.

(2) Should it appear from these clarifications that there is a real prospect of progress being made, a meeting of the four Foreign Ministers.

(3) Should it thereafter appear useful, a wider conference of European and other interested powers to consider the question of collective security in Europe. Text ends.

REPLY TO SOVIET NOTES

The Council met today in private session to consider the reply to the Soviet notes.

2. The chairman opened the discussion by asking whether it was the wish of the Council that all replies should be in identical terms omitting, of course, reference to Germany in the case of the nine powers. The Norwegian representative stated that his government wished that identity of substance be retained, but would leave the exact formulation of the note to each government. Both the Belgian and Italian representatives agreed on the other hand on the suggestion that the reply should be couched in identical terms. The Italian representative added that their reply would, of course, be confined to the second Soviet note, but in order that agreement might be reached quickly on an identical text, he suggested that a working party be set up to consider the matter.

3. Some discussion took place as to which countries would be represented in the working party. At the early stage of the discussion it was understood that the working party was to be composed only of the nine. The special position of Portugal was briefly discussed. The Portuguese representative complained that none of the three powers had transmitted the text of the Soviet note of November 13 to his government. This brought up an explanation on the part of the French representative to the effect that his government had not seen fit to meet a request that the French Government transmit to a foreign government a note with which it did not agree. At any rate, it was decided that Portugal should also be represented in the working party. The French representative suggested that as this involved a matter of general NATO interests, both Canada and Portugal should be included in the working party. I spoke briefly on this point to say that although Canada had not even been invited indirectly, it had a general interest in the NATO consultation on the draft reply to the Soviet note, and that therefore we would wish to take part in the meetings of the working party. Finally, it was decided that all fourteen NATO countries should be on the working party.

4. The working party is meeting tomorrow at 2:30, and will report to the Council meeting of Wednesday, November 24. It is realized that most delegations will not be in a position to submit their governments' comments on the draft reply before the Council meeting, but the United States' representative indicated it was the present intention to send off the replies on November 26.

5. The Greek and Turkish representatives reported on the attitude of the Yugoslav Government regarding the reply to the Soviet note. Although the Yugoslav Government considers the Soviet proposal to hold a conference on European security as useful, it does not agree that the time to hold such a conference is propitious. The Soviet Government has not met certain conditions, the fulfilment of which is considered essential by the Yugoslav Government. Finally, it is the view of the Yugoslav Government that the initiative to hold a conference on European security should not be left to the Soviets. The free world should seize the opportunity to make proposals of its own.

6. During the second part of the meeting, the representatives, at the request of the chairman, submitted their general comments on the basic directives paper and on the draft reply.

7. The Belgian representative stated that the draft prepared by the tripartite working group was extremely satisfactory. His government fully agreed with its two basic assumptions: (a) that the Soviet note is directed at the disruption of the Western plans for ratification of the Paris agreements; (b) it leaves the door opened to further negotiating after ratification.

8. The Turkish representative also noted his satisfaction with the text of the draft reply. It contains all the points which are considered important by his government.

9. The Italian representative stated that all their suggestions are included in the draft reply but he wondered whether we could make some gains — propaganda-wise — by being more positive in our approach. He suggested for instance that the date of the future conference to be held after ratification be mentioned. Also, the agenda of the conference could be outlined. The Italian suggestion found no support. The United Kingdom representative pointed out that the reply was as positive as it could be in that it outlined certain conditions which would have to be met by the Soviets to demonstrate their good faith.

10. I made a brief intervention to outline our general views regarding the Soviet notes, based on the instructions contained in your telegrams No. 833 of November 9 and No. 861 of November 16.

11. In reply to a question put by the Italian representative the United Kingdom representative stated that Molotov's offer to delay the date of the proposed conference on European security, had not changed the plans to send the reply before November 29th.

12. The meeting finally decided that no further information should be given to the press about the present discussions nor the fact that a working party would meet to study the possibility of sending identical replies to the Soviet notes. The matter will be reconsidered at the Council meeting.

13. Action required. Any comments you may wish to submit on the tripartite draft reply should be received before 10:15 Wednesday, November 24.

REPLY TO SOVIET NOTES

The draft reply of the three leading Western powers seems to us to provide a very effective answer to the two most recent Soviet notes. There are two points of substance concerning which you might raise the following questions.

2. One of the main points in the Soviet note of October 23 and in Communist propaganda generally is that "it is impossible, however, at one and the same time to propose a general reduction in armaments and to carry out the remilitarization of Western Germany". It is possible that the Soviet Government will make a good deal of this point when the Sub-Committee of the Disarmament Commission meets. This claim might be answered and paragraph 5 of the draft Western reply made even more effective as a reply to Soviet claims if a sentence were added pointing out that, far from pursuing contradictory policies, as the Soviet Union had charged, the Western powers had, in making plans for the entry of the German Federal Republic into a Western defence association, kept in mind at all times the policies which they had been advocating for years for a reduction in armaments. This sentence could go second from the last in paragraph 5.

3. We note that, whereas in the September 10 note of the Western Powers it is stated that an Austrian Treaty should not be dependent "upon all-European settlement, upon a German peace treaty, or upon any other matter extraneous to the Austrian Treaty", there is no direct reference to this point in the present draft. You might ask whether consideration has been given to repeating this point, which seems to us a good one. If the present draft is being shown to the Austrian Government, then the Austrians will have an opportunity to suggest this point if they think it worth stressing. We would be interested to know, however, whether there is any reason for not stressing this consideration this time.

4. If there is much discussion on wording, you may suggest that the last two sentences in paragraph 9 might be rearranged to make clearer that the Soviet Government is responsible for the fact that no basis exists at present for a useful conference. The present two sentences might be replaced by one sentence along the following lines: "Until they receive some clarification from the Soviet Government of its views on the specific problems of Germany and Austria, there would not appear to exist the essential basis for a useful conference, whether on Germany or Austria or on European security".

5. With regard to paragraph 9 of your telegram No. 1020 of November 18 you will be interested to know that the Italian Ambassador on Saturday asked for our views on their suggestion of fixing a date for an East-West conference to be included in the reply to the Soviet notes. He was told that we considered the idea of a conference should not be accepted as a matter of course, but that the necessary preparations had to be made first. Having not received an invitation, we obviously could not but play a secondary role and we would be prepared to accept what the majority in NATO desired. I presume from your telegram that the Italians will not press this further.

6. You will in the meantime have seen reports of Mr. Mendes-France's speech to the U.N. in New York on November 22 in which he suggested the possibility of a four-power conference in May, but our reading of this seems to indicate that the French would not want to mention this in the reply to the Soviet note.⁴⁴

7. WESTERN REPLIES TO SOVIET NOTES OF OCTOBER 23 AND NOVEMBER 13

European Division: After several meetings of the NATO Council and of the Three-Power Working Group between November 24 and November 27, agreement was reached among the nations concerned on the replies to be made to the Soviet notes of October 23 (sent to the United Kingdom, France and the United States) and of November 13 (sent to twenty-two European countries). It was originally intended to have the Three-Power reply delivered to the Soviet Government on November 27, but last minute changes in the wording of the note and in the plans for timing postponed the delivery until November 29.⁴⁵ The main points in the first draft were retained but the final draft was shorter, no longer contained certain comments on Soviet policies and spelled out in more precise form the various stages envisaged by the Western Powers in carrying on any serious negotiations with the Soviet Government. The "Nine-Power Reply" (the NATO countries among the twenty-two European nations minus the three leading Western Powers) had some last minute changes also, which were felt by some of the nations concerned to have a softening effect. This reply was based very closely on that part of the Three-Power reply which dealt with the general question of European security. Notes from the nine countries were sent to the Soviet Government at the same time as the Big Three notes.⁴⁶ The Canadian representative on the North Atlantic Council had expressed our general agreement with the terms of the Three-Power draft reply and had participated in the discussion concerning the Nine-Power reply as well. Canada was not, of course, closely concerned with the final stages of drafting and sending these various replies to the Soviet notes. (Confidential)

SOVIET NOTE OF DECEMBER 9 TO THE THREE LEADING WESTERN POWERS⁴⁷

The note sent by the Soviet Government on December 9 to the United Kingdom, the United States and France was harder in tone than notes sent in October and November, not because the usual threats about the rearming of West Germans were changed to any appreciable extent, but because there was a reference to the intention of the Soviet Union and the satellite states to take measures to increase their defensive capacity in retaliation for West German rearmament and because the accusations directed at the Western Powers concerning their refusal to attend a conference are harsher. The note claims for example that it is plain that the three leading Western Powers "together with the other members of the North Atlantic bloc acted in such a way as to prevent a participation of other European states in such a conference". The note sent to the French Government refers to the "tricks which are being used in France . . . to lull the vigilance of the peoples".

2. So far as the possibility of negotiation on German unification after ratification is concerned, the Soviet note claims that ratification of the London and Paris agreements "will make the four-power talks on the unification of Germany void of substance and will exclude the possibility of achieving agreement on this question". Ratification of these agreements will also "create new obstacles to achieving an agreement on the reduction of armaments". The note warns the Western Powers that they take upon themselves "the whole responsibility for the consequences of their present policy which is incompatible with the interest of peace and which is leading to a considerable intensification of the danger of a new war in Europe".

3. The note of December 9 is, in form, a warning and not directly a proposal for any particular action, except that of stopping all attempts to integrate the German Federal Republic in a Western defence association. Attached to the note, however, was Declaration made in Moscow on December 2 by the Soviet Union and satellite states. This Declaration contained the proposal that there should be, first of all, rejection of plans for a re-militarization of Western Germany, then "achievement of agreement on holding of free all-German elections in 1955"; "it would then become possible at last to conclude the peace treaty with Germany". Mr. Molotov, in a speech delivered on November 29, on the first day of the conference, proposed "firstly to allow under no circumstances the resurgence of German militarism . . . and patiently to settle the German question on the basis of agreement" and "secondly to establish a collective security system in Europe".

⁴⁷ Voir/See New York Times, December 10, 1954.

4. Both the Declaration and the speech by Mr. Molotov refer extensively to "militarists" in Germany. Mr. Molotov was more precise in estimating that "as soon as implementation of the Paris agreements begins, the German militarists will have at their disposal these millions of men". "These millions" are the three million men which Mr. Molotov said would come from the following sources:

(a) 500,000 men under the Paris agreements;

(b) 500,000 men from police forces and "service units and other militarized auxiliary organizations";

(c) 2,000,000 men from "militaristic organizations" of former Hitlerite soldiers.

5. The most interesting part, perhaps, of those sections of the Declaration dealing with Germany is that which describes the happy future to which Germans could look forward if they would abandon plans for aligning the country with the West. Germany could develop as "one of the great powers". There would be wide possibilities "for development of extensive economic relations between Germany and other countries and especially with countries of Eastern Europe and with countries of Asia with their immense population and inexhaustible resources".

6. The note of December 9 and the attached Declaration sound as though they may be the final pronouncement of the Soviet Government for the time being on the ratification of the London and Paris agreements. The Soviet Government has hardened the tone of its utterances on this subject about as far as it can without causing a flurry of alarm in Western Europe, which would be more likely to help than to hinder the final agreement on West European union. Apparently the Eastern bloc does not intend to take any specific steps towards strengthening its defences until it is clear that the German Federal Republic is going to be rearmed. Further notes from the Soviet Government would, in the face of the stubborn insistence of the Western Powers that the Soviet Union should make some really new offer on Germany and Austria, probably cause the Soviet Government to lose face. There will certainly be organized activity of all kinds in Eastern and Western Europe to impede ratification, but it is hard to see what new approach the Soviet Government could find for official pronouncements which would not appear to be a bit of an anticlimax.

7. It is true that Mr. Molotov, in his speech on November 29,⁴⁸ said that the necessity for safeguarding the defences of nations threatened by the Germans applied not just to the states represented at the conference, but also to "other peace-loving states which do not want to be servitors or abettors in preparing and unleashing a new war in Europe". It might be argued that this indicated a Soviet intention to try some new approach with non-Communist states not members of NATO which would demonstrate that other governments, apart from the Communist ones, felt themselves threatened. Finland is the obvious and perhaps the only country likely to be approached in this way. It seems likely, however, that the Finnish Government, which is adept at manoeuvring in situations like this, would be able to make it quite clear that the Soviet Government was applying pressure to make the Finns comply with their wishes. The result of this move might well be that the necessity of strong Western defences was again made apparent.

8. M. de Villelume came in to give me the preliminary reactions of the Quai d'Orsay which were roughly similar to our views. They thought the Soviet note was timed to have an effect just before the commencement of the debate on the Paris agreements in the French and German parliaments. They do not believe the Russians are prepared to follow up their threats by action.

9. With regard to Austria, M. de Villelume pointed out that the French démarche was made in Moscow on December 7, and that the Soviet note was probably amended at the last moment to include the paragraphs on Austria, which leaves the door just faintly ajar. They believe this is probably intended to be the Soviet answer to their démarche.

10. The preliminary view of the United Kingdom Government concerning the note of December 9 is that "the tone is intimidatory and more aggressive than that of recent Soviet notes, though without, perhaps, finally closing any doors". The three powers are now working out an agreed tripartite line for dealing with the note. There is a strong possibility that they will agree that no reply is required. In that case, there will not likely be any formal consultation with the NATO Council such as has taken place during the drafting of the last two Western notes to the Soviet Government. The subject will probably, however, come up at the meeting of the Ministerial Council this week.⁴⁹

SECRET & PERSONAL. IMMEDIATE.

Following for the Minister from Robertson, Begins: During these last weeks in which for the first time I have had something to do with disarmament problems, I hate to feel very strongly that even if east and west could conceivably agree on ⁴⁹ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

It did not. J.A. C[hapdelaine]

"principles of disarmament" on which our positions are so widely separated, we would still be confronted with an almost impossible task in attempting to negotiate agreement in a disarmament convention on the detailed powers, functions and methods of operation of "an adequate system of international control". Starting as we must from positions of mutual distrust, we would be compelled to insist on terms that one could not reasonably expect to be accepted by the other side. Politically the pressure to try and plug every hypothetical loophole would be very hard to resist. In the process we should probably find ourselves constructing for safety's sake a totalitarian system of control which in the first place would have little chance of acceptance, and in the second place, if by some political miracle it were accepted, would probably be found to be unendurably cumbrous, complicated and unnecessarily interfering.

2. At the same time from the very nature of the negotiation, any agreement ultimately reached would be impossible to amend because the establishment and the institution of the control system would be linked with what one would like to believe were irreversible decisions about the abolition of nuclear weapons, etc.

3. Against this background I wondered whether there might be something to be said for trying to tackle the problem of inventing a suitable and effective technique of international control from another starting point; i.e., one might begin within a group of countries who prima facie trust each other. The technical problems would still be difficult, but in such a context they could be examined objectively and with some hope of solution. Specific types and methods of control could be developed empirically, amended, improved, or abandoned in the light of practical experience of whether or not they were actually serving the purposes for which they were instituted. Such a proving ground might be provided by NATO. In principle at least the concept of international inspection of the forces, equipment training methods, etc., of allies has been introduced into NATO thinking. It is true that its purpose is to improve military efficiency, but it might be susceptible of a double-edged development inside the alliance. Our principal preoccupation in recent years has been to see that our allies and ourselves reach the military marks we have set for ourselves inside the alliance. We may be moving into a phase in which it will become important to make sure not only that those marks are met, but that they are not exceeded or bypassed (this, I suppose was one of the central problems which E.D.C. was meant to solve).

4. I had begun by thinking about the political and technical problems of establishing an adequate system for disarmament, and wondering whether we could attempt to work out within NATO a prototype control which later might become capable of a wider or a universal application. It now seems to me, with the failure of our disarmament talks and with the rapid deterioration of the position in respect of E.D.C., that there may be certain immediate relevance in this line of thinking. The problem of combining rearmament with effective international control is bound to arise inside NATO if the EDC arrangements fall to the ground, and the only alternative put forward is the admission of Germany to NATO. It may be that events have already overtaken us and it may be too late for what I would have regarded as the most desirable line of advance. Politically the best course might be for the countries of NATO, as at present constituted, to accept inter se and formally an additional obligation to work out and apply as between themselves a NATO system of control of armaments — types, quantities, numbers, etc. — incorporating some at least of the E.D.C. controls on arms production enforced by an international NATO inspection team. Such a development might with luck be found to have within it the beginnings of a world-wide system of armament control.

5. In the meantime it might provide a non-discriminatory framework through which Germany could be received into NATO without setting up grave additional strains inside the alliance. Leaping further ahead one might wonder whether the Soviet Union would have so lightheartedly talked about joining NATO if such an obligation had been one of its component parts. Alternatively it might be a little awkward for them to withdraw their application for membership because membership involved acceptance of an international obligation to accept whatever was found to be the requirements of an adequate international system for the inspection and control of armaments. Ends.

Note pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures
Memorandum for Secretary of State for External Affairs

TOP SECRET

[Ottawa], July 16, 1954

NATO, THE EDC AND ARMAMENT CONTROL

Introduction

Mr. Robertson's telegram No. 741 of June 26, 1954, was evidently prompted (see his paragraph 4) by his concern over two problems:

(a) the failure of the London disarmament talks in which he had participated;⁵⁰ and

(b) the rapid deterioration of the EDC situation.

2. He makes the bold and imaginative suggestion that NATO might be developed in a way that would help solve both these problems sooner or later. He suggests that the members of NATO, as at present constituted, formally accept an additional obligation to work out and apply as between themselves a NATO armament control system, incorporating some at least of the EDC controls, enforced by international NATO inspection teams. In his opinion two useful consequences might ensue:

(a) "such a development might with luck be found to have within it the beginnings of a world-wide system of armament control," presumably because the West would have constructed a working model of an armament control system, the merits of which might eventually be recognised by the Soviet Union and other countries; and

(b) "it might provide a non-discriminatory framework through which Germany could be received into NATO without setting up grave additional strains inside the alliance."

⁵⁰ Voir/See United States, Department of State, Bulletin, Volume XXXI, No. 788, August 2, 1954, pp. 179-181.

3. It appears that Mr. Robertson was considering the disarmament problem when these thoughts occurred to him, and he therefore gave second place to their bearing on the EDC problem. To us in Ottawa the latter problem seems much the more urgent of the two. In this memorandum we shall therefore take the liberty of discussing Mr. Robertson's suggestion first and foremost as a promising solution of the EDC problem. The more distant prospect that one day it may also open a way out of the disarmament impasse will be mentioned only incidentally.

Nature of the EDC Problem

4. Recent emphasis on ratification of the EDC Treaty has rather distracted attention from the basic problem of Franco-German relations. This problem, to which the EDC may no longer be able to provide a solution, is fundamentally one of an increasing unbalance of power between the two countries. This consideration is examined in greater detail in a departmental memorandum of July 12 (copy of which is attached as Annex "A").

5. There are only two ways to correct the Franco-German unbalance of power. One is to keep Germany weak — which is patently impracticable — and the other is to reinforce France. The only framework within which France can be reinforced is provided by NATO. However, in order to bring Germany into NATO on self-respecting terms and at the same time ensure that German re-armament is carried out under proper safeguards, it would be necessary for all NATO countries to agree to give the Organization additional functions in the field of armament control. This brings us to Mr. Robertson's proposal.

Mr. Robertson's Proposed Solution

6. Although Mr. Robertson did not enter into such detail, a convenient outline of an armament control system, covering both conventional and nuclear weapons, is contained in a United States working paper offered to the Disarmament Commission sub-committee during its recent London meeting. This proposal (which had been discussed with and approved by the United Kingdom, French and Canadian delegations beforehand) called for the creation of a UN Disarmament and Atomic Development Authority. Under this Authority would be a Disarmament Division, responsible for the reduction and limitation of all armed forces and conventional armaments, and an Atomic Development Division, responsible for the international development and control of atomic energy. Details of the organization and functions of the proposed Authority and its Divisions are attached as Annex "B".†

7. We have made a preliminary study of the technical feasibility of developing such a control system within NATO. This study is attached as Annex "C". We have come to the conclusion that it would at least be feasible to set up in NATO a control machinery along the lines of the proposed UN Authority, provided the member countries were prepared to assign to this machinery the necessary powers of inspection. We have also suggested several ways in which NATO might establish the control machinery in progressive stages in order to introduce flexibility into the procedure. The functions given to NATO in this field need not, in the first instance, be all-embracing but, if a start could be made, it might be found that, with growing confidence in each other, member countries would be prepared to delegate to the Organization an increasing measure of their sovereignty in the defence field.

8. Mr. Robertson suggested that the NATO armament control system could incorporate some of the EDC controls. Attached as Annex "D" is a summary of the more important controls provided by the EDC Treaty.[†] You will see that they go far beyond those envisaged under the proposed UN Authority. While the latter places its main emphasis on the disclosure and verification of information by means of a Corps of Inspectors, the controls envisaged in the EDC Treaty rely primarily on the assumption by supranational organs, notably the Commissariat and the Assembly, of national functions in the defence field. The proposed UN Authority would be given specific powers of inspection involving a certain voluntary limitation of sovereignty by the participating countries. The EDC machinery would go much further toward establishing supranational direction in the military, political, financial, economic and production fields.

9. Our study of the question leads us to believe that it would be impossible to establish in NATO the sort of supranational structure and controls envisaged in the EDC Treaty without completely re-writing the North Atlantic Treaty. Not only would the NATO Secretariat have to be given supranational functions along the lines of those vested in the EDC Commissariat, but there would also have to be instituted a NATO parliamentary assembly to bring the structure into line with that of the EDC. In effect, the EDC control system could only be applied to all the NATO countries if they were all prepared to adhere to the EDC Treaty.

10. Mr. Robertson's proposal, it should be noted, is not necessarily an alternative to the EDC. Ratification of the EDC Treaty and the Contractual Agreements still remains the best way forward for all the reasons we have so exhaustively examined in other memoranda. We should allow no thought of alternatives to distract our support from this familiar programme. Indeed, Mr. Robertson's suggestion might, if it commended itself to the United Kingdom and the United States, radically improve the prospect for EDC ratification in the next few critical weeks. The assurance that France's major allies were prepared to tighten and strengthen the NATO framework within which the EDC would be received might well win over some of those French leaders who have opposed the EDC because they considered that the United Kingdom and the United States were not closely enough associated with it. This consideration involves the delicate question of whether there is some risk that the NATO proposal might be used in France to justify still further delay in ratifying the EDC.

11. If the EDC fell to the ground Mr. Robertson's suggestion might assume even greater importance. Prompt action would then be needed to prevent the Western Alliance from falling into a sad confusion. Part of such action has just been planned in London, where means to restore German sovereignty in default of the Contractual Agreements have been worked out by Foreign Office and State Department officials. But means would also have to be found to re-arm West Germany safely in default of the EDC Treaty. This is where Mr. Robertson's proposal comes in, with its admittedly ambitious, but at the same time practical means of strengthening the Atlantic Community to enable it to accomplish successfully the integration within it of West Germany. Mr. Robertson does seem to have found for us that elusive "best alternative" to the EDC for which we have been looking in recent months.

Views of Certain Interested Countries

12. We have attempted to estimate the probable reactions of the countries concerned to Mr. Robertson's suggestion seen as an alternative to the EDC. Our estimate is given as Annex "E". We consider that the suggestion would be favourably received in each of the six countries presently involved in the EDC. The Nordic and Balkan members of NATO would be somewhat dubious, particularly the former, but they would be influenced by the United Kingdom and the United States respectively. The attitude of the two Anglo-Saxon powers would therefore prove decisive. The United Kingdom would not go much further than the United States. The prospect of United States support, while gloomy, would not necessarily be hopeless.

13. As far as Canada is concerned, we believe that Mr. Robertson's suggestion accords well with the thought, which the Prime Minister and you have often expressed, that the further development of the Atlantic community might help to solve the stubborn problems of Franco-German distrust. It seems to us that it offers NATO the best means of encouraging France to ratify the EDC, or of keeping the upper hand over the situation which would develop immediately if the EDC should collapse. It would also provide a useful and much needed fillip to morale in the Western world at a time when its disunity is becoming increasingly dangerous.

Conclusions

14. The following are the main conclusions which emerge from the foregoing discussion:

- (a) Mr. Robertson's suggestion merits serious and urgent consideration at the highest level;
- (b) It is technically feasible;
- (c) It would either assist or provide a good alternative to EDC ratification; and
- (d) The attitude towards it of the United Kingdom and especially of the United States would prove decisive.

Action Recommended

15. If you agree with this appreciation we suggest that the following steps appear to be indicated:

- (a) That you consult with the Prime Minister and your other Cabinet colleagues as to whether Canada could accept the additional NATO protocol that would be involved; then, if their reaction is favourable,
- (b) That the matter be taken up in an exploratory way with Mr. Eden and Mr. Dulles with the suggestion that the idea may be useful either as an aid to EDC ratification or as an alternative if EDC fails of ratification.

16. Subsequent steps would depend on the reactions of Mr. Eden and Mr. Dulles and on the factor of timing. If it is decided to await final decision on the EDC before considering Mr. Robertson's suggestion, I would propose the following course:

(a) If the decision is unfavourable, then we should put the suggestion forward at a special Ministerial meeting of the North Atlantic Council which should be convened as soon as possible; but

(b) If the decision is favourable, as we may still hope, then we might still consider putting it forward in NATO at some appropriate time in the future, perhaps in a modified form.

Annex A

NATO, THE EDC AND THE GERMAN PROBLEM

Although Mr. Norman Robertson's proposal for a NATO system of armament control (his telegram No. 741 of June 26) was put forward primarily in connection with the problem of disarmament, it is in the context of the German problem that it should be most seriously considered.

2. It is true that NATO as such has no direct responsibility for the German problem. For many reasons, however, NATO will be affected by the future status and orientation of Western Germany and must willy-nilly be concerned with it. For one thing, the defence of Western Germany forms an integral part of NATO strategic plans. An attack on allied troops there would bring Article 5 of the North Atlantic Treaty into operation. Moreover, NATO is publicly and irrevocably committed to the proposition that Western Europe cannot be successfully defended without defending Western Germany and that Western Germany cannot be defended without a German military contribution. For another thing, the Three Powers which hold a special position both in NATO, by virtue of their membership in the Standing Group, and also in Germany, as occupying powers, are committed to the progressive restoration of German sovereignty. For better or for worse Western Germany will be re-armed and will become a sovereign state once more. The most important question now is how these developments will affect the Atlantic Community. As Sulzberger said in an article from Paris in the New York Times of June 27:

"It is no longer a question of how Western Germany shall be armed. It is a question of where German weight will be felt in the global scales — and of eventual repercussions in France. Ultimately it is a question of the very existence of the North Atlantic Treaty community — as now constituted."

3. At present these two parallel developments (German rearmament and the restoration of German sovereignty) are tied together within the supranational framework offered by the EDC Treaty. Unfortunately this framework, which was originally devised to make German re-armament palatable to the Germans and safe for the French, now seems to pose an insoluble dilemma. The French hesitate to sacrifice such a large measure of sovereignty and to bind themselves so closely to their erstwhile enemy. The Germans, increasingly restive under the occupation régime, threaten to go their own way if they are not soon restored to an equal place in the western community of nations. To bring about ratification of the EDC Treaty sufficiently quickly to satisfy Germany risks alienating France and strengthening neutralism there. On the other hand, to delay ratification much longer may jeopardize Chancellor Adenauer's pro-western policy and strengthen support in Germany for a second Rapallo. The result would probably deal a fatal blow to NATO.

4. I believe that to find a safe way out of this dilemma we must find a solution to the basic problem of Franco-German relations; and I venture to suggest that the EDC cannot now provide this solution. The problem is fundamentally one of an increasing unbalance of power between the two countries. France is no longer a first-class military power. The long blood-letting in Indo-China, where so many of France's badly needed officers and NCO's have been lost, the economic difficulties and political instability at home and the steady sapping of morale by neutralism have reduced France to a position of relative impotence. She has been unable to meet her NATO commitments; she was one armoured division short of the force goals forecast for 1953 and SHAPE's estimate of the effectiveness of her army forces shows serious shortages in the units to be mobilized after M-day. Germany, on the other hand, has made a remarkable post-war recovery and is steadily gaining in economic strength, political influence and self-confidence. From an original position of reluctance, German public opinion seems to have developed considerable support for re-armament as an attribute of sovereignty. Indeed, there has been talk that the twelve divisions at present planned as the German contribution under the EDC are only a beginning and should later be raised to twenty-four.

5. There are signs that a realization of relative French weakness is an important element in French opposition to the EDC. For example, Marshal Juin, originally a supporter of the idea of a European army, recently made a volte face and denounced the EDC Treaty. Also Mr. Blankenhorn, Chancellor Adenauer's foreign affairs expert, is reported to have said that the French had asked the Germans to accept as the German contribution to the EDC four divisions instead of twelve (Despatch No. 512 of May 26, from Bonn).†

6. Recent emphasis on ratification of the EDC Treaty has probably distracted attention from this basic problem of the unbalance of power in Western Europe. Yet it is now becoming increasingly clear that, whether or not the EDC comes into force, this problem will remain unsolved and will block the Franco-German reconciliation on which the long-term peace and security of Western Europe depend. Even if the EDC is established, the chances are that it will founder on Franco-German rivalry.

7. There are only two ways to correct this unbalance. One is to keep Germany as weak as possible, to restrict German sovereignty and to prohibit or severely limit German rearmament. This is patently impractical. The other way is to reinforce France; and the only method that I can see for doing this is to bring the United Kingdom into whatever arrangement is made on the same terms as France and Germany. The United Kingdom would in turn insist on the United States also being a party to whatever European arrangement the United Kingdom itself entered. The obvious framework for such an arrangement is that provided by NATO. However, in order to bring Germany into NATO on self-respecting terms and at the same time ensure that German re-armament was carried out under proper safeguards, it would be necessary for all NATO countries to agree to give the Organization additional functions in the field of armament control.

8. This is where Mr. Robertson's proposal comes in. It offers an admittedly ambitious, but nevertheless practical, means of strengthening the Atlantic Community sufficiently to enable it to accomplish successfully the integration within it of Western Germany. It is also a flexible means of doing this. It would avoid the stupendous problems involved in establishing a supranational body such as the EDC. At the same time it would furnish a machinery capable of fixing and controlling the level of forces of Germany (and of all the NATO countries) by common agreement. The armament control functions given to NATO need not in the first instance be too far-reaching (they might apply only to forces assigned to NATO, for example) but, if a start could be made in this direction, it might be found that with growing confidence in each other member countries would be prepared to delegate an increasing measure of their sovereignty in the defence field to the Organization. If such a step is not taken, I foresee increasingly serious stresses and strains within the alliance and an increasing danger that both the three Western Powers and the alliance as a whole will lose all influence over the course of events in Germany.

Annex C

TECHNICAL FEASIBILITY OF DEVELOPING AN ARMAMENT
CONTROL SYSTEM WITHIN NATO

Existing NATO arrangements for international supervision of armed forces and their weapons do not go nearly as far as the functions proposed for the UN Disarmament and Atomic Development Authority described in Annex "B". The NATO arrangements, of course, were not developed with either control or atomic development in mind. They arose from the agreement by member countries of NATO to raise specified numbers of armed forces and assign them to NATO's integrated commands, and to contribute to a common fund for the construction of fixed installations required for the support of those forces. Essential to the success of this common effort have been the mutual aid contributions of arms and equipment which Canada and the United States have made to the European members.

2. One form of supervision which already exists in NATO is the Annual Review. In order to arrive at the agreed force goals and to provide a basis for determining the mutual aid needs of the European members, NATO carries out each year a review of the defence programmes of all the member countries, which involves the collection of detailed information concerning their forces, their defence production programmes and their defence expenditures, both present and planned. To assist the member governments in compiling this information, officials of the NATO Secretariat and officers from the NATO Supreme Headquarters visit national capitals and discuss outstanding problems with the government departments concerned. When the information has been compiled it is subject to a thorough examination, first by the NATO Secretariat and later by other member countries, and the country being examined may be asked to clarify or amplify doubtful points.

3. Another form of supervision exists in the work carried out by the special agencies of the Standing Group in the field of standardization and by the Production and Logistics Division of the NATO Secretariat in the field of correlated production programmes in Europe. This division of the Secretariat contains experts on each of the major items of military equipment and ammunition, who make it their business to obtain as complete a picture as possible of defence production in Western Europe and to assist in the solution of production and equipment problems.

4. In addition, the defence programmes of the European countries are subjected to continuing surveillance by the Military Assistance Advisory Groups (MAAG's) which the United States maintains in national capitals to advise on the allocation of United States mutual aid. It is a function of these Groups, and of the United States Mutual Security Administration to which they report, to assess what level of forces each NATO country is able to support and to judge what amount of United States assistance could be efficiently used and would be desirable, in the interest of the alliance as a whole, to supplement the country's own effort. This United States machinery has in fact acted on occasion (particularly during the last year) as a form of armament control system. In certain cases (Greece and Turkey, for example) NATO countries have pressed for higher force goals than the United States considered they could afford to maintain over the long term on the basis of the mutual aid they were likely to get. In these cases the United States used its influence to restrict the level of forces recommended by the NATO military authorities as desirable for these countries and to keep their force goals to a given maximum.

5. It is obvious from the foregoing that Mr. Robertson is suggesting an entirely new development for NATO. The basis of the close co-operation and exchange of vital information which now take place between NATO countries is the common objective of strengthening their collective defence. The emphasis is on the voluntary furnishing of information. On the other hand, there is probably no inherent reason why this machinery of co-operation could not be developed into a system of armament control if the member governments so desired. It would mean shifting the emphasis from the present voluntary system, in which discretion is left to member governments in the last analysis, to a system of enforcement, in which member governments would surrender a large part of this discretion to NATO. In order to use NATO for this purpose, member governments would have to assume an obligation additional to those at present in the North Atlantic Treaty, to allow supervision by a NATO inspection body of all aspects of their defence programmes.

6. If such an obligation were accepted, there is no reason why the armament control system proposed by the United States could not be adapted to NATO. The North Atlantic Council, composed as it is of sovereign states, could act for this purpose in the same way as would the proposed UN Authority. The Secretary-General and the Secretariat of NATO could fulfill the functions prescribed for the Director-General and the Secretariat of the Authority's Disarmament Division. NATO has nothing resembling the Corps of Inspectors which the United States proposal envisages. However, provision could be made for the appointment of such a corps by the Secretary-General on the nomination of member countries.

7. The Atomic Development Division of the proposed UN Authority might pose a more difficult problem of adaptation. In the United States proposal this Division would be under the supervision and control of the Board of Governors appointed by the permanent members of the Authority, whereas the Disarmament Division would be under the supervision and control of the Director-General, responsible direct to the Authority. There is a certain analogy in the NATO structure. Whereas the NATO Secretariat, headed by the Secretary-General, is directly responsible to the North Atlantic Council in Paris, the military agencies of NATO are responsible to the Standing Group in Washington, on which only the Three Powers are represented and which acts as executive agent of the fourteen member countries. The Standing Group, like the Board of Governors of the proposed Atomic Development Division, occupies a semi-autonomous position and is allowed considerable discretion in handling matters of the highest security nature. For a NATO armament control system additional authority might be given to the Standing Group (perhaps with the addition of Canada to its membership for this purpose) to enable it to act as a board of governors in matters of atomic development. It could set up a special agency under it to carry out the functions of the UN Authority's Atomic Development Division.

8. The specific functions and rights of the Council, the Secretary-General and the Standing Group in respect to disclosure and verification of armed forces and conventional and atomic weapons, and the obligations of member countries in this field, could be laid down in an additional Protocol to the North Atlantic Treaty, which would presumably require ratification by all member countries. The same purpose might even be served by a less formal procedure, such as a resolution of the North Atlantic Council, but whatever form it took, it would have to embody obligations sufficiently binding to give the control machinery real powers and deter violations.

9. It would probably be neither possible or desirable to attempt implementation of such an inspection and control system in NATO all at once. It should rather be established in progressive stages (similar to those proposed by the United States in the UN Disarmament Commission) starting with armed forces and the least sensitive forms of conventional weapons and moving gradually into atomic weapons. It might also be suggested, if this became necessary in order to win United States (and possibly also United Kingdom) support, that there be at the same time a progression of geographic stages, starting perhaps with control over the signatories of the EDC Treaty, extending later to the other members of NATO and after that to the United Kingdom, the United States and ourselves. There are several ways in which such progressive implementation could be reflected in the Protocol (or other instrument) establishing the control system. The Protocol might be comprehensive, binding member countries to the establishment of the whole system, but might leave the definition and timing of the various stages to the Council; or it might bind member countries only to the first stage of control and leave it to the Council to obtain agreement to subsequent stages.

10. It is difficult to predict what effect the assumption by NATO of such armament control functions might have on the Organization's ability to perform its primary function of collective security. In the days of the rapid build-up of forces such control functions might have been incongruous. More recently, however, this rapid build-up has been succeeded by the "long haul" and the emphasis now is on the level of forces and armaments that member countries can maintain over an extended period. Under these conditions the political or psychological effect on NATO of placing a ceiling (as well as a floor) on member countries' defence programmes is unlikely to be adverse. Indeed, as has been pointed out above, the United States mutual aid machinery has already operated in practice to impose such a ceiling. In any case, it would be essential to make clear that the establishment of a NATO control system did not imply unilateral Western disarmament.

Annex E

VIEWS OF CERTAIN INTERESTED COUNTRIES ON MR. ROBERTSON'S SUGGESTION, SEEN AS AN ALTERNATIVE TO EDC RATIFICATION

France

Mr. Robertson's suggestion would seem to have obvious merit from the French point of view. The hesitation about the EDC felt by several influential members of Mr. Mendes-France's government (although, if Mr. Spaak is to be believed, no longer by Mr. Mendes-France himself) indicate that all the concessions so far made — the protocols, the Saar, the United States and United Kingdom declarations — are still insufficient. The French opponents to the EDC, while naturally satisfied with its provisions insofar as they would limit German rearmament, seem to remain dubious about two other points: they are reluctant to see the French army, from whose glorious traditions they draw much comfort, dissolved into a European army, in which the French contingents might be commanded by German generals; and they are unconvinced that United States and United Kingdom relations with the EDC would be close enough to counterbalance the ascendancy which Germany would certainly gain within it before very long. The admission of Germany to a NATO developed as Mr. Robertson suggests would seem to offer satisfaction on all these points: it would ensure an adequate control of German rearmament, preserve the integrity of the French army, and provide for United States and United Kingdom participation on an equal basis.

Germany

2. If the EDC, upon which the Federal Republic has staked so much, were to fail, Mr. Robertson's suggestion would certainly arouse interest in Bonn. It would not be the first step demanded by the new circumstances: the restoration of German sovereignty would have to come first. But no matter how that was effected, the Federal Republic would have to undertake not to rearm except under conditions agreeable to the other members of the Western alliance. These conditions would be met if the Federal Republic were admitted as a sovereign and equal member of NATO, which would itself have developed an armament control system.

3. Such an arrangement would probably not affect the question of German reunification very much one way or another. For reasons mentioned below Soviet hostility to NATO, even in the altered form proposed by Mr. Robertson, would likely continue for some time to come. So, therefore, would the partition of Germany. However we do not believe that this prospect would diminish German interest in NATO, any more than it has weakened their backing for the EDC up till now, and for the same reason: the Germans would stand to gain so much in other ways.

Italy

4. The Italian delay in ratifying the EDC appears to be caused, not so much by any feeling that it is defective, as by the desire to strike a better bargain over Trieste. Unlike France, Italy is not seeking an alternative to the EDC. This does not mean, however, that it would not be interested in such a reasonable suggestion as Mr. Robertson's in case France rejected the EDC. Indeed, should Italy not receive satisfaction on Trieste, it might itself reject the EDC, but still be willing to go along with the development of NATO into a closer form of partnership.

Benelux

5. The Benelux countries, like the Federal Republic, have all ratified the EDC. Should the decision go against the EDC, however, they have already informed Mr. Mendes-France that in their view the only possible alternative would be the admission of the Federal Republic as a sovereign and equal member of NATO. Although the idea of developing armament controls within NATO does not seem to have occurred to them as yet, there is no reason to doubt that they would be favourably impressed by it, to the extent that they share France's fears of uncontrolled German rearmament.

Nordic and Balkan Members of NATO

6. Norway, Denmark and Iceland at the northwestern end of the NATO crescent, and Greece and Turkey at the southeastern end have always regarded the EDC sympathetically. However, partly because of their geographical situation, they have never seriously considered membership. They are therefore the first of the countries so far reviewed for whom Mr. Robertson's suggestion would entail the surrender not of less, but of more national sovereignty. It is probable that the Nordic countries at least would hesitate before making such a sacrifice. Their reserved attitude towards NATO bases is hardly encouraging. However, they might find armament controls easier to accept than foreign troops and installations. Also, they have all expressed themselves as favourable to a controlled German contribution to Western defence, and they are all themselves accustomed to a certain degree of such control, as practised by the United States MAAG's mentioned in paragraph 4 of Annex "C". Probably, in the end, the attitude of the United Kingdom would prove decisive for the Nordic members of NATO, and the United States attitude for the Balkan members.

United Kingdom

7. British and, as we shall see, American reactions to Mr. Robertson's suggestion are likely to be even more reserved, at least initially. Although the United Kingdom has always supported the EDC for the six countries concerned, and has gone a long way towards a close association with them, it has steadfastly opposed any notion that it might itself become a member. It has also been reluctant to see the political development of NATO extended beyond the present modest limits, e.g., its wariness regarding political consultation within NATO's Permanent Council. These are the understandable reactions of a great power. The United Kingdom fears to lose its comparative freedom of action in Europe, and its privileged entrée in Washington, by any closer association with the continental countries than appears essential. Nevertheless it would certainly not wish to remain aloof from any European development in which the United States had decided to participate. In the end, therefore, everything would seem to depend upon the United States attitude.

United States

8. Here the greatest difficulty is likely to arise. Since 1945 "security" has become a national preoccupation with the United States, as evidenced by the McMahon Act, the McCarran Act, the investigations conducted by various Senate and House committees, and so on. Americans attach great importance to the physical manifestations of security, including security clearances of individuals, use of security guards, and rigid control of security information on a "need-to-know" basis.

9. For these reasons it would appear most unlikely that the United States would be prepared to release information, even to its NATO partners, on the size and distribution of forces other than those specifically committed to NATO commands, or on most aspects of its atomic weapons development and production program. The United States does exchange information with the United Kingdom and Canada on the development of conventional weapons, but has on many occasions made it clear that it is not prepared to make similar cooperative arrangements with other NATO countries. Under such circumstances it is difficult to see how any "inspection" or "disclosure" scheme could be made to work in a NATO context.

10. It is true that at the London disarmament talks the United States offered to participate in a world-wide disarmament system. It would not be at all inconsistent, however, if it were to refuse to take part in any system that was not world-wide. The United States could argue that its security would be imperilled if it were to disclose any of its defensive arrangements, even to its allies, as long as any enemies remained to whom these arrangements might subsequently be betrayed. The only conditions on which it might consider accepting disclosure and inspection arrangements within a limited group of allied countries would seem to be that all these countries should submit to security controls operated from Washington. Considering the present disrepute of these controls everywhere abroad, it is hardly likely that the Western allies would submit to them at any price.

11. The situation is not without certain promising aspects, however. For one thing the United States Administration has recently asked Congress for authority to pass to NATO certain atomic information hitherto denied under the McMahon Act. Secondly, if the proposed NATO armament controls were derived, not from the EDC but from a United States working paper as we are suggesting the State Department could hardly refuse to give the idea a thorough examination. And thirdly, the Americans are known to be considering the possibility that the Western allies explore the peaceful uses of atomic energy unilaterally, in default of the Soviet collaboration which has been invited and refused. This notion of theirs — which, incidentally, does not seem to have met with much approval in Whitehall — might provide a peg on which to hang the suggestion that we tackle the disarmament problem unilaterally.

Soviet Union

12. There remains the Soviet reaction to consider. Mr. Robertson visualizes the possibility that the Soviet Union might eventually be impressed by the honest intention and efficacious operation of the NATO armament control system. It might then be less reluctant to participate in such a system itself, either under NATO, or more probably UN auspices. At last a world-wide system or armament control would begin to look more feasible. But such a happy development, obviously, is reserved for the more or less distant future. One way of determining just how distant might be to decide why the Soviet Union opposes German rearmament. If it is motivated by a deeply-felt fear of Germany, it is likely to take an even darker view of Germany rearming under NATO auspices than within the EDC, because in NATO Germany would seem to be under more direct control from the Pentagon. But if its attitude is prompted more by the tactical opportunities the issue presents for splitting the Western alliance, then once Germany had been admitted to NATO, particularly under the conditions envisaged by Mr. Robertson, it might well decide to accept the situation with equanimity. In the first case Soviet hostility to NATO might never be abandoned; in the second, a tacit agreement to live and let live might be reached in the foreseeable future. Out of such an agreement world disarmament might — or might not — eventually develop. All that can be said at this stage is that there appears to be no reason to suppose that the Soviet Union would make Germany's admission to NATO in the near future a casus belli. Consequently the Western allies might as well disregard the present Soviet attitude in making their arrangements, even while allowing themselves the slight hope that it might one day change for the better.

NATO, THE EDC AND ARMAMENT CONTROL

Following for Robertson from Acting Under-Secretary, Begins: We regret that an acknowledgement of your important telegram No. 741 has been delayed until now. The Minister is intrigued with your suggestion in relation to the Atlantic alliance. He mentioned the idea casually and in very general terms to Mr. Eden during the latter's visit here but we did not report this since neither Eden nor Caccia made any response. As you will have gathered from my telegram No. 339 of July 14 to Paris,† repeated as No. 1006 to you, he also mentioned it in very general terms to the French Ambassador last week.

2. Meanwhile the Department has made a detailed study of your suggestion. We infer that you were principally concerned, in putting it forward, with the disarmament problem. While recognising its long-term possibilities in this connection, we have concentrated more on its relevance to the EDC problem. Also, we have modified your suggestion somewhat on technical grounds. We feel that it would be impracticable to adapt EDC controls to NATO, but that it would be feasible to adapt the controls envisaged by the United States working paper presented during the London disarmament talks. With these variants we continue to believe that your suggestion merits serious and urgent consideration as one possible means of assisting EDC ratification or, if needs be, of providing a possible alternative thereto.

3. We have prepared a memorandum for the Minister to this effect. Copies are going out immediately to you, and to our missions to Paris, NATO, Bonn, Rome, The Hague, Brussels and Washington and the U.N. We shall acquaint you with the Minister's comments as soon as we receive them. Naturally, we look forward to receiving your comments as well. Ends.

NATO, E.D.C. AND ARMAMENT CONTROL

It has occurred to me that it might be useful to exchange ideas with the Foreign Office at this stage. Would you see an objection to our suggesting that we give them a copy of Annex "C" to the memorandum for the Minister of July 16th, in return for the commentary which they prepared for Mr. Eden (my telegram No. 838 of July 17).†

2. One of the things I had in mind when putting forward the tentative ideas in my telegram No. 741 of June 26th was that there already exists a precedent of sorts for an inspection procedure within NATO, to the extent that, as I understand it, SACEUR is responsible in peacetime for organization and training, and is therefore empowered to exercise direct control over the higher training of national forces assigned to his command and to inspect the training of all such forces. This is not mentioned in the analysis of the present situation within NATO contained in Annex "C", and I thought it might be worth drawing to your attention.

NATO, EDC AND RE-ARMAMENT CONTROL

I agree with your proposal to exchange ideas with the Foreign Office at the official level at this stage. There are, I feel, positive advantages to be gained from having a clear conception of United Kingdom thinking on German re-armament generally and some reaction to our tentative views relating to re-armament control within NATO before considering how we might approach other interested governments.

2. There would be no objection to your giving the Foreign Office a copy of Annex C of the Memorandum to the Minister of July 16 in return for the commentary prepared for Mr. Eden. In doing so you may wish to mention the point raised in paragraph 2 of your telegram which, I think, might be expressed in a more general way. You might say that some measure of direct control already exists in the sense that the integration of national forces under unified NATO command in Europe already involves a measure of supervision over the numbers, equipment and state training of the national forces involved. You [may] also wish in handing Annex C over — as a [document] prepared to the official level — speak to it [in terms] of Annex A to give its broad political background.⁵¹

NATO, E.D.C. AND GERMAN REARMAMENT

In accordance with your instructions we have given a copy of Annex "C" of the memorandum to the Minister of July 16th to Laskey in the Western Organizations Department of the Foreign Office, filling in the background in terms of the broad political arguments contained in Annex "A". Laskey agreed that the fundamental problem is the increasing unbalance of power between France and Germany, but said he doubted whether there was really any solution to it other than the efforts of the French themselves. This unbalance has been used, for example, as an argument for United Kingdom membership of the E.D.C., but in his opinion such an approach to the problem was misguided in that if adopted it would tend to encourage the French to rely on outside assistance and to assume that on all occasions the British would back them in any difficulties or disagreements with their German partners.

2. Laskey promised to look into the possibility of letting us have whatever had been prepared in the way of commentary on Mr. Robertson's suggestions for a control system within NATO, and in any case to discuss the analysis in Annex "C" as soon as he has had time to study it.

3. In this general connection, we were very much interested in seeing the report on thinking in the State Department on German rearmament contained in Washington's telegram No. WA-1347 of July 31st.† It would appear that, starting from more or less similar premises and with the same goals in mind, the State Department and the Foreign Office have come to opposite conclusions as to the way in which the necessary safeguards could be made most palatable to the Germans.

4. So far as we have been able to find out from recent conversations with officials in the Foreign Office handling German and NATO affairs, thinking here has not progressed much, if any, beyond the suggestions regarding the transfer to NATO of essential safeguards from the E.D.C. Treaty which were outlined in the working paper submitted a month ago during the Anglo-American discussions on Germany. The Foreign Office are apparently awaiting United States reactions, which have so far not been received. It is still the assumption that the Federal German Government would find it difficult, if not impossible, to accept any restrictions on rearmament which were applicable to Germany alone. Hence the conclusion that the ideal solution would be to deal with the problem through the incorporation in NATO of provisions from the E.D.C. Treaty in such a manner as to make them, in form at least, applicable to some or all of the other NATO members.

5. With reference to the current odds on the chances of E.D.C. in view of the increasing prestige of M. Mendes-France, the Foreign Office, like the State Department, are much encouraged by the Premier's approach. They pointed out, however, that the latest time-table does not leave much margin for possible delays. Even if the Treaty is passed by the Assembly, it will in all probability be turned back by the Council of the Republic. In this event, it is extremely doubtful that there would be time for the Assembly to vote on the E.D.C. again before the recess, which would leave the whole question still in abeyance until the Assembly reconvenes in the Fall.

6. With reference to parliamentary procedure here in connection with the implementation of the Contractual Agreements, the Government is, as you know, committed to affording an opportunity for debate before ratification of any agreements that are made. It is not felt, however, that this implies any serious delay, since agreement on the next step could hardly be reached much before the end of September, and Parliament reconvenes shortly thereafter.

NATO, THE E.D.C. AND ARMAMENT CONTROL

I. Introduction

We share your view that Mr. Robertson's proposal is of more immediate interest in its bearing on the German re-armament problem than in relation to a world disarmament programme. In any case it is the former problem which is of more direct concern to this Mission, and accordingly we shall confine our comments to this aspect of the proposal. We shall, moreover, assume that it is now too late to put the proposal forward prior to the E.D.C. debate to take place during the last week of the month in the French Assembly.

II. Our First Reaction

2. Leaving aside for the moment the broad context in which the matter has been set out in the Memorandum for the Minister, all of us in this Mission were immediately struck by the considerable difficulty which the proposal, if implemented, would create for NATO. While it is true that NATO has a number of aspects, there is no doubt that throughout its existence its chief raison d'être has been the Western re-armament programme. The most significant of NATO's regular activities is the Annual Review, a process designed to use all possible means to improve both the quantity and the quality of the West's defence forces. It was for this reason that the Permanent Council was set up. For the last two years or so, this programme has been a difficult one, as the initial shock of Korea has worn off and Governments have become increasingly aware of the pressures opposing a continuing and expensive armaments programme. NATO has had to strain every effort to maintain the impetus which still survives. If to this single-minded purpose and structure there is grafted a concept and a procedure for limiting armaments, we think there will inevitably be a conflict between the two. The loss of direction and of purpose which would result would seriously threaten the defensive structure which has been erected with so much effort and cost.

III. Franco-German Relations

3. Returning now to consider the proposal in a broader perspective, we recognize that the point of departure for a study of this, as of so many other problems, is the vexed question of Franco-German relations. We find ourselves only partially in agreement with the outline analysis of this problem appearing in the Memorandum to the Minister and elaborated in Annex A to that Memorandum. We agree that the problem arises essentially from the imbalance, which is steadily increasing, between the two major countries of Western Europe. Fundamentally this imbalance is a question of resources, human and material, and of the use of these resources which social and political conditions in the two countries make possible. France, once a world power, is one no longer; while she still has considerable resources, she appears unable to exploit them. Germany, on the other hand, is strong and is rapidly growing stronger. Up to this point we are in entire accord with the views outlined in the Memorandum.

4. The memorandum then suggests that "there are only two ways to correct the Franco-German imbalance of power". Frankly, we consider that this imbalance is inherent in the situation, is a fact of life with which the French will have to learn to live in much the same way as the United Kingdom is gradually becoming adjusted to a similar relationship toward the United States. We agree that it is patently impracticable to keep Germany weak; but no amount of outside reinforcement can make France strong if she cannot find the sinews of strength within herself.

5. The Memorandum then speaks of reinforcing France within the framework of NATO. In effect this means, and we believe that this is the real line of argument of the Memorandum even though it does not emerge specifically, that there should be set in the balance against Germany not only France, but additional weights coming primarily from the United States and the United Kingdom. This general concept is of course not new, and underlies the "guarantees" and "associations" which have been worked out to link the two latter powers to the proposed E.D.C. The concept is certainly a valid one, but up to the present it has appeared that the U.S. and the U.K. have gone as far in this direction as they are prepared to go. Their commitments have not been sufficient to overcome French hesitations concerning the future course of Germany, and accordingly there persists the likelihood that even if E.D.C. is ratified, it may be wrecked by German assertiveness or French suspicion and sensitivity.

6. As we interpret the argument set out in the Memorandum, it is suggested that Mr. Robertson's proposal makes a direct attack on this problem. It is true that it does involve a new commitment which the U.S. and the U.K. might perhaps be prepared to undertake in conjunction with France and Germany. It would not, in itself, make France stronger or keep Germany weak, but to the extent that it bolstered French confidence or restrained German "pushing", it would undoubtedly help to make German re-armament palatable. We believe that it would not in any fundamental sense solve the problem of Franco-German relations, but it might make the problem more tractable.

IV. The E.D.C.

7. It may be useful at this point to review in broad outline the history of the E.D.C. On very short notice and under strong U.S. pressure, NATO accepted in the autumn of 1950 the thesis that a military defence of Western Europe was possible only with German assistance. In consequence, the principle of German re-armament in some form was accepted, and is still held, as a NATO objective. To meet this objective, the simple and obvious course would, of course, have been to admit Germany to NATO and authorize the creation of a German military establishment. Such a course was regarded by the French Government of the day as politically unacceptable to France. Accepting the obligation which this rejection imposed upon it to produce an alternative plan, the French Government (again acting hastily) devised the E.D.C. The essence of the plan was to incorporate German resources, both human and material, in the Western rearmament programme in such a way that control would be exercised, not by the German Government but by a supra-national authority through which neighbouring countries could ensure the protection of their own vital interests. It was, of course, the hope of the French Government in putting forward the plan that the United Kingdom would become a full member. In that case, Germany, France, the United Kingdom, and such other continental countries as could be induced to join, would in effect be shut up together in a tight little box where no country could take any significant initiative with regard to military preparations without the consent of the others. On the assumption that France and the U.K. would act together to control Germany, in case of difficulty, the box was seen as a container for Germany.

8. When it became clear that the United Kingdom was unwilling to participate in this plan, France might have been well advised to seek a new and different solution to the problem of rearming Germany safely. The dangers ahead, however, do not appear to have been clearly recognized; perhaps it was assumed that France with the support (on which she could probably count to a fair extent) of the other four prospective members, would herself have been able to control German ambitions. If that was the position two years ago, it clearly no longer survives. In the face of German economic and political strength, France obviously has no confidence that Germany can be effectively controlled within the bounds of E.D.C. The increasing imbalance which has been discussed above, and the loss of confidence resulting from two more years of French impotence, have altered the picture considerably. The box which was to be a container for Germany has now become a trap through which France and the rest of Western Europe would fall under German domination.

9. We believe that this analysis provides a clue to the proposals which Mendes-France has now put forward for the modification of the E.D.C. Treaty.⁵² The two positive aspects of these proposals are to destroy the supranational control which the E.D.C. was intended to embody, and to make withdrawal from the community a very much easier process, in other words, to let France out of the trap. The negative aspect of the new proposals (leaving aside the particular discriminations against Germany, which are of local significance only) is to remove the former controls previously laid upon Germany and thus, in effect, to permit Germany to re-arm independently. As much of the support outside of France for the E.D.C. plan has been based on its provisions for a considerable measure of integration of Western Europe, and as that particular aspect is almost entirely removed by the new French proposals, it is natural that they should find little support among the signatories other than France. Nevertheless, this fact should not blind us to the strategic advantage of the looser scheme. There is little doubt that the recruitment and training of German forces under a German Ministry of Defence and General Staff would make a faster and more effective contribution to the military capacity of the Western World. While such a development may justly give rise to misgivings, it has nevertheless been a declared aim of all NATO Governments for some years.

V. Germany and NATO

10. Consideration of the new French proposals leads to a further thought. If France is in fact prepared to accept German rearmament in the form provided by the new (or Mendes-France) version of E.D.C., then there is little practical reason why she should not go further and accept German membership in NATO. On first analysis, it appears to us that the Mendes-France proposals give Germany membership in NATO in everything but name.

11. While the press does not appear as yet to have recognized this fact, we suspect that it soon will. Of course, it is already apparent that there is almost as much opposition within France to the Mendes-France version of E.D.C. as to the original version. This opposition is clearly based upon that large fraction of French opinion which has never accepted the desirability of rearming Germany in any form. No method of re-armament of Germany will satisfy this element in French opinion. Nevertheless, it is unlikely that this element constitutes either in the country or in the Assembly a genuine majority. The reason it has been so difficult to get a majority in favour of E.D.C. is that the potential majority which accepts the principle of German re-armament has nevertheless been bitterly divided upon the means. If, as appears probable, this potential majority has now come to feel that the E.D.C. represents not a safeguard but a trap, then it is logical to believe that during the next weeks or months, they may be prepared to accept the principle of national German re-armament along the lines sketched out by the Mendes-France proposals. Yet to preserve the name and not the substance of the original E.D.C. plan, will obviously involve major difficulties for all the other signatories. The reactions to Mendes-France's proposals in other E.D.C. capitals are already making this point clear.

12. The upshot of this admittedly speculative line of thought is that it may be possible upon suitable conditions to obtain French approval for the admission of Germany to NATO. It now seems unlikely that France will ever accept E.D.C. in its supra-national form. It may be that France would accept E.D.C. as emasculated by Mendes-France, but this solution is unlikely to be acceptable to the other signatories. It may prove that the only possible ground for agreement is an admission of Germany to NATO under special conditions.

13. If Germany is to be re-armed with the consent of the Western powers there are only four possible methods, and of these that involving free re-armament without controls and without commitments to the West is obviously totally unacceptable to all concerned. The three remaining methods are:

(a) Under supra-national (European) control, and tied to NATO — the old version of E.D.C.

(b) Within the NATO frame but with effective control exercised by the German Government.

(c) Through a special, non-NATO alliance, presumably with the U.S. and perhaps the U.K.; this would necessarily involve association with NATO.

14. For the reasons discussed above, we do not believe that France will accept alternative (a). Alternative (c) is presumably even less attractive to France, as it would clearly mean that in a very short time France would become merely another NATO power and the West's "Big Three" would be the U.S., the U.K. and Germany. There remains alternative (b), which covers both the new or Mendes-France form of E.D.C. and also the alternative of German admission to NATO. As we have indicated, we do not think a "de-supra-nationalized" E.D.C. would be acceptable to the signatories other than France. German admission to NATO, on the other hand, has nothing directly to do, pro or con, with European integration, and while the others would not welcome it, there is no particular reason why they should refuse. But for them, as even more for France, it would have to be accompanied by special conditions.

VI. The Problem of German Admission to NATO

15. It might be argued that in her new-found strength Germany would insist upon unconditional admission to NATO or none at all. Nevertheless it appears to us that a reasonable case could be made out for the imposition of special conditions that would not necessarily appear discriminatory. Leaving aside the fact that Germany is an occupied country, an argument which Germany would not accept as relevant, there is the non-controversial fact to distinguish Germany from present NATO members that at the present time Germany has no Defence Ministry and no General Staff. While we have not studied the question fully enough to propose an exact formula, it appears to us that upon this fact one could hang a provision that the levels for Germany's various military programmes should be determined by the North Atlantic Council as a part of the Annual Review process. Indeed NATO has already had to deal with the problem of two governments (Greece and Turkey) which have wished to carry military programmes beyond their economic capacity.

16. There could then be laid down a set of principles to cover the determination of these levels ('in the light of economic and political considerations') which on the one hand would provide for effective limitation and on the other hand might be presented as the necessary means of overcoming the technical problem created by Germany's present lack of a Defence Ministry and a General Staff.

VII. Armament Control

17. The thoughts outlined above have led us some distance away from Mr. Robertson's proposal for a NATO armaments control programme. This is because we have wished to outline the considerations which bear on our judgment of it. We mentioned earlier our belief that the introduction into NATO of a general concept of armament limitation, which would be in conflict with NATO's present guiding theme, would cause great difficulty in maintaining the allied defence programme. In general we support the interpretation (in Annex E of the Memorandum to the Minister) of the probable reactions of various interested countries. In particular, we believe that there is little if any prospect that the United States would participate to the extent which would be necessary for the programme to be regarded by Germany as more than a trick. The success of the proposal would certainly rest upon genuine United States participation and such participation we regard as most unlikely. It is well known that the United States Government and particularly the Department of Defence has little confidence in the reliability of the security systems of a number of its NATO allies. As long as the risk of war with a well-armed Soviet Empire exists, it is difficult to imagine that the United States would give such vital information to Governments which are believed to have many Communists highly placed throughout their civil and military services.

VIII. Conclusions

18. Our analysis, in line with the declared NATO objective, has focussed upon the particular question of German re-armament. While this is not the only possible starting point, we believe that it is the most realistic one when the U.S. position is given the weight it deserves. Recognizing this "militaristic" bias as an element in our thinking, we might sum up our views in the following manner.

19. We believe the chance of genuine United States participation is so slight, and the prospect that even this would persuade France to accept E.D.C. in supranational form so remote, that we do not see Mr. Robertson's plan as a promising complement to the old version of E.D.C. We consider the new or "pseudo-NATO" version of E.D.C. to be unacceptable to the proponents of European integration, as it represents for them the shattering of deeply held ideals. If France is to accept German rearmament and still continue an effective member of NATO, we believe that it can only come about through the establishment of a control over Germany in which the United States and the United Kingdom would participate along with France. This could be achieved through the admission of Germany to NATO under certain conditions. The conditions would have to include provision for control over the level of German armaments. While there are difficulties in either course, we believe on balance that such control is more likely to be obtained without damage to other basic objectives through the establishment of special conditions for Germany than through the application on a NATO-wide basis of Mr. Robertson's proposed armament control scheme. This last point, however, is certainly debatable, and it is undoubtedly possible that it would be easier to obtain support for German admission to NATO in both France and Germany if Mr. Robertson's plan were to be used. We are impressed by the arguments in support of the proposal, particularly those arguments relating to this political problem, which are set out in Bonn's despatch No. 781 of August 13.† With most of those arguments we are in sympathy, but we consider that the despatch in question does not give sufficient weight to the harmful effect upon NATO of combining the principles of rearmament and disarmament, or to the strong probability that the United States would not be prepared to participate. Hence our conclusion, necessarily tentative, is more or less as follows:

(a) France will reluctantly accept German rearmament, but not in a supra-national structure limited to the continental powers alone.

(b) The other continental powers will not accept German rearmament in a manner which formally rejects the concept of European integration.

(c) It will thus be finally accepted that Germany should be admitted to NATO.

(d) This could be done either with the help of a NATO armaments control plan or through the negotiation of special terms of admission.

(e) Either of these courses would be difficult, but we believe the former would be seriously disruptive to NATO as a whole. We believe the alternative course is feasible and should be encouraged.

TELEGRAM 1037

EDC

I saw the Foreign Secretary this morning. He was not very happy about the general state of things. He has been trying to work out within the Foreign Office and with the Cabinet a line of policy for the United Kingdom to pursue if, as seems more and more likely, the French Chamber does not approve EDC in this week-end's debate. He would himself like to find a way by which the United Kingdom could enter into a modified EDC, but thus far he had not been able to work out any form of association which could stand up to the scrutiny and criticism of his colleagues. As matters stood he could not see any way of reconciling the French desire for the inclusion of the United Kingdom as a full partner in a European Defence Community with the political and strategic necessities of the United Kingdom position.

2. In the circumstances the United Kingdom now felt compelled to think seriously about the feasibility of containing German rearmament within NATO. He gave me a copy of the Foreign Office working paper on the conditions and safeguards which the United Kingdom should seek to secure in any negotiations looking to the incorporation of Germany into NATO. The text of this paper, which is going up to Cabinet this week, is contained in my immediately following telegram No. 1038. Eden recognized that it would be difficult and probably impossible to get the Germans to agree to all these conditions, and even if they did agree to them he did not feel United Kingdom opinion would be very happy about German rearmament in this inevitably much looser framework. In particular he felt the majority in the Labour Party and the TUC which had loyally supported German rearmament within EDC would find it very difficult to agree to the recreation of a German national army with its own general staff, etc. On the other hand one had to remember that Adenauer himself had not hitherto wanted Germany in NATO. This genuine reluctance on his part would be reinforced by the increasingly strong bargaining position which Germany with the aid of events had made for herself. The more closely one looked at feasible alternatives to EDC, the less one liked them, but he feared these alternatives would have to be pretty seriously and searchingly examined during these next weeks if the French debate should end either with the rejection of EDC or inconclusively.

3. He was inclined to think that the next step should be to explore with Adenauer the problem of German association with NATO. He did not like putting pressure on the French by isolating them, and told me that he had intervened from Geneva to block an earlier American suggestion which Churchill had been inclined to accept for a conference of the EDC ratifying countries, plus the United States and the United Kingdom, from which France would have been excluded. However, at the present juncture he thought it would be waste motion for the other powers concerned to try to start next week negotiating with France on the basis of whatever riders, qualifications or amendments might have been produced by an inconclusive EDC debate in Paris. There might be something to be said for giving France an opportunity for its own "reappraisal" of the consequences of rejecting the European Defence Treaty. Eden thought the State Department, which probably recognized it had been a little too officious with its good offices in Brussels last week, were likely also to share this view.

4. Eden had not yet discussed with Washington the question of when and how and by whom the problem on German relationship with NATO should be explored with Adenauer. He did not want to invite Adenauer to London, and he did not himself wish to go to Bonn. At the same time he thought the Americans might feel that there was a good deal to be said for the United Kingdom raising the whole range of problems with the Chancellor informally and secretly and at the earliest opportunity.

RESTRICTIONS ON GERMAN REARMAMENT WHICH MIGHT BE FEASIBLE
IN THE EVENT OF GERMAN ADMISSION TO NATO
(UNITED KINGDOM WORKING PAPER)

Public opinion in France and other NATO countries will not readily accept German membership of NATO without some restrictions on German rearmament. These restrictions, if they are to be acceptable to German opinion, must not discriminate too obviously against the Germans and must apply to other countries as well. The ideal solution would be to transplant to NATO as many of the essential EDC safeguards as we can persuade the Germans to accept as the price of joining the leading western "club" as a full member.

We might aim at agreements on the following subjects:

(a) Germany's initial contribution. The size and character of the initial German defence contribution to NATO would be agreed with the Federal Republic as part of the negotiations for her admission to NATO. It would be based on the EDC figures of twelve divisions and 1300 aircraft. It would comprise neither submarines nor strategic bombers. The agreement might include a clause to the effect that any change in the composition or strength of the German contribution could only be made in consultation with the North Atlantic Council (i.e., through the annual review process) and in accordance with agreed NATO strategy.

(b) Strategically exposed areas. A protocol might be added to the North Atlantic Treaty to reproduce the EDC Agreement that within "strategic areas" certain types of arms production and research, including atomic and thermonuclear weapons, submarines and military aircraft, would only be permitted by decision of the North Atlantic Council. In order to avoid obvious discrimination against the Germans it will probably be necessary to define as "strategic areas" not only the Federal Republic but also parts of the NATO area also contiguous or nearly contiguous to the Soviet "empire" such as North Norway, Denmark Thrace and Turkey north of the Straits.

(c) A European arms pool. A European arms pool would have political and psychological value. The six EDC countries might adopt within NATO a plan for an arms pool, incorporating the essential features of the relevant provisions of the EDC Treaty (i.e., control over production, import and export of war material). The drafting of the plan for such an arms pool would have to be left primarily to the EDC countries.

(d) Commitment of forces to NATO. In order to prevent Germany from maintaining forces other than those committed to NATO, an agreement might be concluded between all members of NATO on the lines of Articles 9, 10 and 11 of the EDC Treaty. Thus NATO members might agree that apart from forces placed under SACEUR no armed forces will be maintained except:

- (i) Police and gendarmerie intended for the maintenance of internal order;
- (ii) Troops for the personal protection of the Head of State;
- (iii) Forces required for international missions (e.g., UNO) or for any other purpose approved by the North Atlantic Council;
- (iv) Forces which any member required to fulfil its defence responsibilities in the North Atlantic area other than the European mainland or outside the NATO area.

(e) Integration and deployment of NATO forces.

- (i) Measures might be taken to give effect to what is already agreed to be SACEUR's first responsibility, namely, the creation of a genuine and effective integrated forces, notably in the air, so that all German air units could be grouped with other nationalities in NATO air formations.
- (ii) The position of Western Germany in the centre of the NATO front line, coupled with the obvious temptation for German forces to cross the zonal frontier to assist their compatriots in the Soviet zone or even later on to modify the Oder-Neisse frontier, make it essential to establish effective NATO control over the location and movement of the German forces.

We can reasonably expect the Germans to agree, as the United Kingdom and the United States agreed in the recent declarations about the EDC, that their forces shall be deployed in accordance with agreed NATO strategy. In addition, it might be agreed that national forces placed under SACEUR shall not be moved within the NATO area nor revert to national control for use within the NATO area without the consent of SACEUR and the North Atlantic Council. We could not in the case of Germany allow a repetition of the Italian action in September 1953 in sending troops and ships to the Yugoslav frontier without any consultation with NATO. The presence of Allied forces in Germany would of course be an additional and effective safe-guard.

(f) Maintenance of United States and United Kingdom troops in Europe. To supplement these suggested measures of control probably the most satisfying assurance that could be given to the French (particularly from the psychological point of view) would be some guarantee of the continued presence of United Kingdom and United States forces on the continent. Their presence would be essential in connection with, e.g. paragraph (e)(i) above. The United Kingdom and the United States have already stated, in connection with their proposed links with EDC, their intention to keep on the continent their fair share of forces required for European defence as long as the threat exists. New declarations on similar lines might be made by both governments.

(g) Extending the duration of the North Atlantic Treaty. An additional reassurance to the French (which would be particularly effective if guarantees as envisaged in paragraph (f) above were given) would be the addition of a protocol to the North Atlantic Treaty to remove the possibility of denunciation before fifty years. The idea that the treaty should be considered of indefinite duration has already been ventilated in the North Atlantic Council and in a broad sense approved. A legal life of fifty years might greatly help to reconcile public opinion to German rearmament. This provision might be included in the protocol inviting German accession to NATO.

(h) German assurance against any attempt to modify existing frontiers by force. One of the main objections to German admission to NATO is undoubtedly the fact that the Federal Republic (and probably a future reunited Germany) would be a territorially dissatisfied power, under constant temptation to modify its eastern frontiers by force and to drag the whole of the NATO alliance into war for that purpose. This objection is a real one and cannot be completely met. But we should at least require the German Federal Republic to make the type of declaration (suitably amended to meet the altered circumstance) which Dr. Adenauer last December agreed to make over the proposed security guarantees to be offered to the Russians in connection with the entry into force of the EDC. This would be buttressed by a version of the accompanying statement by the three western powers amended to take account of the new situation and to include all other NATO powers.

[Ottawa], August 27, 1954

GERMAN ADMISSION TO NATO

You will have seen Mr. Robertson's account of his interview with Mr. Eden (Canada House telegram no. 1037 of August 26) during which the Foreign Secretary outlined the difficulties surrounding any arrangement to associate the United Kingdom more closely with a modified EDC and the problems involved in imposing conditions on German rearmament should Germany be admitted to NATO. It is apparent that the United Kingdom is not prepared to make any last minute concessions which might increase support for the EDC in France and consequently they are currently studying seriously the feasibility of containing German rearmament within NATO in the probable event that the Treaty of Paris is rejected by the French Assembly or the debate is inconclusive. (The outline of the United Kingdom plan for restrictions of German rearmament in the event of German admission to NATO is contained in Canada House telegram no. 1038 of August 26.)

2. Mr. Eden recognizes (and I think you would agree) that it would be difficult and probably impossible to get the Germans to agree to all these conditions as the price of joining NATO particularly since Germany, as a result of recent events, is in a stronger bargaining position.⁵³ He has indicated to Mr. Robertson that the next step probably should be for the United Kingdom to explore secretly with Chancellor Adenauer the problem of German association with NATO, although it is apparent that he has not yet discussed this course of action with Washington.

3. According to the information we received earlier from our Embassy in Washington, the State Department is not enthusiastic, and in fact can see strong objections, to the United Kingdom plan for imposing restrictions on German rearmament in the event that Germany is admitted to NATO. While they agree that there must be restrictions on German defence production and German military forces, their main objection to the United Kingdom plan is that it would result in a type of second-class membership for Germany in NATO which would not for long be acceptable to German public opinion. The State Department is thinking in terms of a new agreement between the Three Powers and Germany which would come into effect at such time as the prohibition of German rearmament might have to be removed. In addition to binding the Federal Republic not to seek reunification of Germany or the reintegration of the lost German territories in the East by force of arms, the agreement would prohibit the manufacture in Germany of some of the items listed in the EDC Treaty (e.g. atomic weapons, biological weapons, etc.) and at the same time bind the Federal Republic to try to meet some of the force goals set for it by NATO. In this latter connection the United States considers it might be possible to draft a clause which could be interpreted in Western Germany as an undertaking on the part of the Federal Republic to do its full share in contributing to the common defence of the West and could be interpreted in France and the United Kingdom as setting a limit on German rearmament.

4. In our view there would seem to be considerable merit in endeavouring to work out as soon as possible a plan acceptable to both the United States and the United Kingdom (and possibly to the other NATO members) for controlling German rearmament within NATO before making any approach to the Germans, particularly in the light of the possible repercussions in France should it appear that the United Kingdom is attempting to put pressure on France by making a separate approach to the Germans. In addition, an immediate approach to the Germans, before a mutually acceptable plan for German rearmament has been worked out, could mean that German rejection of most of the features of the United Kingdom plan might make it more difficult to obtain some compromise solution between the opposing United States and United Kingdom viewpoints.

5. Although we have not had an opportunity to study the United Kingdom plan in detail, our preliminary reaction is that it provides a much more realistic practical approach to the problem (i.e. through modifications in existing NATO arrangements which as you know is one of the basic features of Mr. Robertson's original proposals) and is more likely of acceptance from the French point of view (and moreover would probably have the support of the other EDC countries since the United Kingdom plan envisages the incorporation of many of the safeguards contained in the EDC Treaty) than the United States plan of having the safeguards included in a separate agreement between the Three Powers and the Federal Republic. In addition, any separate treaty would probably have to obtain parliamentary approval in France whereas modifications of existing NATO arrangements might not.

⁵³ Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Yes [L.B. Pearson]

6. In the circumstances, if you agree with this analysis of the situation, I suggest that we might instruct our High Commissioner in London to inform the Foreign Office of our views. I suggest, if you approve, that Mr. Robertson might emphasize our concern at the reaction in France to a separate United Kingdom approach to the Germans at this juncture, particularly when you have already expressed to the French Premier our sympathetic understanding of the difficulties which his government faces and since we have stressed the importance of obtaining a settlement which will protect the interests of France and advance the cause of Atlantic cooperation. A separate approach to the Germans at this time might also serve to convince them (to borrow Mr. Ritchie's expression) that they are the "teacher's pets" while France is "at the bottom of the class".

7. If you think it advisable we might also ask the Foreign Office and State Department to consider jointly with us possibly in Washington the plan, originally suggested by Mr. Robertson and elaborated on in the Departmental memorandum of July 16, as a preliminary to raising this in some larger body such as NATO Council.⁵⁴

There are reports in the press emanating from Washington that if, as seems very likely, EDC is defeated in Paris, a meeting of six European members of NATO, plus Germany and the United States, will be called to decide what to do next in regard to Germany's association with collective defence.

⁵⁴ Note marginale :/Marginal note:

How can we discuss modifications to NATO with the Germans before we discuss them in the NATO Council. [L.B. Pearson]

2. I have been very surprised that in these references, which are apparently inspired by the State Department, there is no suggestion that Canada should participate in such a meeting. This would certainly be hard to explain here in view of the contribution we are now making to European defence, and which will certainly be affected by the breakdown of EDC. Canada's absence from any such meeting would certainly encourage those forces in this country who look forward to the day when we can lessen, or even withdraw from the commitments we have already undertaken under NATO.

3. I would be glad if you would enquire of the State Department whether there is any validity to the above reports.

TELEGRAM EX-1538

Ottawa, August 31, 1954

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Repeat London No. 1275.

In the light of your telephone conversation this morning with Ford, you might inform Elbrick that we are currently thinking in terms of German association with NATO as the most practical means of providing for a German defence contribution. However, in order to do this on non-discriminatory terms calculated both to meet legitimate German aspirations and at the same time to provide for adequate safeguards on German rearmament, we are inclined to the view that it would be necessary for all NATO countries to agree to give the Organization additional functions in the field of armament control. We consider that there may be some merit in exploring the possibilities of such a plan particularly since the United Kingdom proposals (as contained in Canada House telegram No. 1038 of August 26 repeated to you) are open to the serious objection (already expressed to you by the State Department) that they provide for a form of second-class membership for Germany in NATO.

2. If our understanding of the present thinking in the State Department is correct (as reported in your telegram WA-1347 of July 31),[†] the Americans appear to be favourably disposed towards the idea of German admission to NATO but unlike the United Kingdom, they would prefer to have the safeguards on German re-armament and German military action included in a new treaty between the Three Powers and the Federal Republic which would at the same time bind the Federal Republic to try to meet some of the force goals set for it by NATO. Apparently the State Department considers that it would be possible to draft a clause in this agreement which could be interpreted in Western Germany as an undertaking on the part of the Federal Republic to do its full share in contributing to the common defence and could be interpreted in France and the United Kingdom as setting a limit on German re-armament.

3. While we have not yet studied the United States views in detail (and we would be grateful for any additional information you are able to provide) our preliminary reaction at the official level is that they attempt to solve an essentially NATO problem in a quadri-partite basis only. In addition it would probably be very difficult to work out in that framework any agreement which would be acceptable to the French and which would be able to obtain French parliamentary approval. In the circumstances we consider that there might be some additional merit in devoting serious thought to the principles of our plan which, even if it were to require parliamentary approval in France, would likely prove more acceptable to the Assembly.

4. Accordingly you might relay these thoughts informally to Elbrick. You might also mention orally some of the salient points of Annex C to our memorandum of July 16 avoiding, however, any mention of the parts touching on atomic control.

5. It would be useful to inform your United Kingdom colleagues to the same extent that Foreign Office has been informed by Mr. Robertson.

6. We hope to be able to send you shortly further information concerning the next steps. For your information, our preliminary thinking is that talks might be held by you with State Department officials in Washington and simultaneously in London with the Foreign Office.

EUROPEAN DEFENCE COMMUNITY

24. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported on the recent debate which had taken place in the French Assembly concerning the European Defence Community. The Canadian mission in Paris had never thought the E.D.C. would be approved by the Assembly. Having in mind that Canada had a brigade group and an air division of over 300 planes in Europe, he had sent a message to the Premier of France to record Canada's interest in the matter of the defence of Western Europe.⁵⁵ Surprisingly, the message was made public and as a result had been interpreted in Canada as a warning; but Mr. Mendes-France had thanked him for it and said that it was helpful and comforting. It appeared to have done no harm. While, in many ways, it was useful to have the E.D.C. question settled, it had been decided in a most unfortunate manner. The decision was taken on a motion of closure and the proponents of the plan had therefore been prevented from discussing it. The Premier appeared to be playing a curious role. He indicated that he wanted E.D.C. approved but he was apparently relieved that this had not happened. Furthermore the issue had not been made a vote of confidence. Mr. Mendes-France was now going to endeavour to produce a solution to the problem himself.

The reactions in Washington and Bonn to the killing of E.D.C. could be dangerous. In the United States, the forces of isolationism might be strengthened or France might be written off and separate defensive arrangements made with Western Germany. In the latter country unless something useful were done in the near future, Chancellor Adenauer's position would be gravely weakened. His position had already been weakened by the defeat of E.D.C. and the defection of certain prominent West Germans to the Communist side. Chancellor Adenauer could not play an active part in public affairs much longer because of his age, and it was doubtful if those who would succeed him would inspire the confidence he had amongst Western nations.

It now seemed desirable to have the whole matter of European defence and West Germany's position placed before the NATO Council, as soon as some thought had been given to the character of any new arrangement which might be reached. The United States had wanted a NATO meeting immediately but, because of the discussions at Manila regarding the formation of a Southeast Asian Defence Organization, the earliest time at which such a meeting could take place would be in October. The United States would probably suggest that West Germany be admitted to NATO with a minimum of restrictions. France would resist this strongly. It should be possible, however, to find a way for using the NATO machinery to control armaments. The Premier of France might try to reach an agreement with West Germany outside of NATO auspices and then seek to have her admitted to the organization afterwards subject to such agreement. We should press to have the matter discussed fully with a view to integrating West Germany in the Organization as soon as possible, otherwise it would be too late and that country might drift rapidly towards a closer connection with the Soviet bloc. It was to be hoped that public opinion in the United States and the United Kingdom would not become too bitter towards France. Mr. Mendes-France's support in his own country was not too strong despite his successes prior to the E.D.C. debate.

25. In the course of discussion, the following points emerged:

(a) Canadians would be unlikely to want to continue to keep forces in West Germany unless the West Germans themselves were permitted and were prepared to share in their own defence.

(b) With regard to the Manila Conference, the position of the United States had now altered quite considerably and their proposals for a tight security pact had been watered down. It seemed that U.S. policy was becoming more realistic but one result was that Thailand and the Philippines were more impatient with the United States than they had been heretofore.

(c) French fears that Germany might dominate Europe did not seem realistic in an age of thermonuclear weapons of great destructive power.

26. The Cabinet noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding the fate of the European Defence Community following the debate in the French Assembly, and agreed it would now be desirable that the question of the defence of Europe and the position of West Germany be considered at an early meeting of the NATO Council.

Apparently the Scandinavian states and Canada alone of the NATO members are to be omitted from this consultation. You will appreciate the difficulty and embarrassment that this would cause us.

2. I have reminded the Commonwealth Relations Office of the considerations put forward in your telegram to Washington EX-1512, and enlarged on the embarrassments that might arise from our omission from the list of countries to be consulted. I am seeing Swinton and Kirkpatrick later this afternoon and will put the same point to them. The United States is reported in the press to have expressed a preference that the first general consultation should take the form of a NATO ministerial meeting. I assume this would be your view too. In the circumstances I am inclined to think the best object to work for is a very early NATO council meeting, not necessarily ministerial, because of the time difficulty and Dulles' absence, which could sponsor exploratory negotiations between those of its members most directly concerned with the German defence contribution, and Germany. I assume that if negotiations were sponsored by NATO, there would be no question but that Canada would be among the countries invited to take part.

RESTORATION OF GERMAN SOVEREIGNTY AND GERMAN REARMAMENT

We understand CRO will be providing you with a more detailed account of action which it is proposed to take following failure of French Assembly to approve EDC. This message will merely attempt to outline the main points as told to us today.

2. It is intended to proceed immediately with simultaneous consultations in Bonn and Paris regarding the putting into effect of the Bonn Conventions. These consultations will be based on the two draft protocols and the draft exchange of notes produced by the Anglo-American working group here on July 12th. So far as Bonn is concerned, the two High Commissioners are approaching Adenauer separately. We gather that Conant had an appointment this morning and that Hoyer Millar will be seeing Adenauer later this afternoon. Part of the reason for separate consultations is that the Foreign Office wish to sound Adenauer out in a very general way regarding his reactions to the solution of the rearmament problem through membership in NATO as envisaged in the British working paper transmitted to you in my telegram No. 1037 of August 26th. We gather that the State Department, on the other hand, do not wish to go any further at this stage than discussion of the protocols relating to the restoration of German sovereignty, although they have no objection to the British raising the question of a defence contribution through NATO, providing it is made clear that is strictly a British initiative. The Benelux countries and the NATO council will probably be informed Saturday of the action taken regarding the Bonn Conventions, and, we assume, will be given copies of the relevant documents.

GERMAN REARMAMENT AND NATO

Canadian High Commissioner in London has reported by telephone that, contrary to press reports, the United Kingdom has not yet issued invitations to an 8-Power meeting. Robertson is seeing Foreign Office this morning and will express Canadian Government views as follows:

(1) There should be an early NATO Council meeting, either at Ministerial level or of Permanent Representatives;

(2) Question of German participation in Western defence should be considered in the NATO forum and not in an 8-Power or 3-Power meeting separate from NATO;

(3) It would be preferable to allow enough time before the NATO meeting to permit of careful preparation. However, if we must choose between a premature NATO meeting and a non-NATO meeting, we strongly prefer the former.

(4) Our preference for the NATO forum applies even if it were suggested that Canada be invited to any non-NATO gathering.

(5) When the NATO Council meets it might well decide to delegate, to a group of NATO members, the responsibility of negotiating with the German Government and of course reporting back continuously to the NATO Council. This smaller group might be the three Occupying Powers or it might be the Three Powers plus the E.D.C. countries plus Canada. (We realize of course that the three Powers have, as Occupying Powers, certain authority relating to German sovereignty which is not and cannot be derived from the NATO Council.)

2. Please immediately inform at a high level the Foreign Office of the country to which you are accredited of the Canadian Government's views as given above.

3. In answer to enquiries, press will be told here (and you may do the same in reply to enquiries) of Canadian views given in sub-paragraphs (1) and (2) above, and also that, while we are still studying the matter, we cannot at present see any satisfactory alternative to Germany's association with NATO. We are not at this stage telling the press of our idea that NATO Council should delegate the task of negotiation with the Germans to a smaller group.

4. This telegram is being sent for action to all Canadian Missions to NATO countries and repeated for information to London, Bonn and our Delegation to NATO in Paris.

NATO, EDC AND GERMAN REARMAMENT

The failure of the French Assembly to approve EDC has now confronted the Western Allies with the same difficult problems (though in a more highly charged atmosphere) to which the Paris Treaty appeared to provide the answer. These problems — West German sovereignty and a controlled German contribution to Western defence — must be solved together if we assume, as we must, that French co-operation in the formulation of Western policy with respect to Germany is essential to the unity of the North Atlantic Alliance. Of the two problems, the most difficult is that of German rearmament. When that is solved the problem of German sovereignty should prove relatively easy, since it is not German sovereignty itself but one of the important attributes of sovereignty (i.e. the right to national armed forces) which, in French eyes, raises the spectre of German militarism. The basic framework for terminating the occupation régime and recognizing German sovereignty has already been agreed between France, the United States and the United Kingdom in consultation with the Federal Republic. However, to attempt to solve the question of sovereignty first would almost certainly complicate the solution to the rearmament problem.

Main Considerations

2. Our approach to a solution of these problems is based on the following assumptions:

(a) As agreed at the Brussels Meeting of the North Atlantic Council in 1950, a German defence contribution is essential to the defence of Western Europe;

(b) This contribution must be obtained in such a way that legitimate German aspirations are met while, at the same time, the members of NATO, and particularly France, are assured of adequate safeguards against misuse of German military power;

(c) To do this inevitably involves tackling the underlying problem of Franco-German relations, which in many respects is fundamentally one of an increasing unbalance of power between the two countries;

(d) With the failure of the EDC, NATO seems to provide the most practical framework within which the harmful effects of this unbalance could be counteracted by bringing in the United Kingdom and the United States to offset German military and economic strength.

(e) If NATO is used for this purpose, German admission must be brought about in such a way as to preserve the unity of NATO and to ensure (as far as it is possible) the permanent integration of Germany within the Atlantic Community.

3. These considerations have led us to the conclusion that the solution to the twin problems of German sovereignty and a German defence contribution which offers the best prospect of permanency is one involving the admission of a sovereign Germany to NATO after there has been instituted in NATO as a whole a system of armament control adequate to safeguard against a resurgence of German militarism. Any restrictions on German sovereignty retained as a condition of Germany's admission to NATO are unlikely to last for long and the strains among member countries which their removal would create might disintegrate the Alliance. Whatever controls on German rearmament we consider essential should be so established that they appear non-discriminatory, or as nearly so as possible.

4. We set out in our memorandum of July 16, and particularly in Annex "C" to that memorandum, a plan which would offer a solution along these lines. You will recall that the plan was that the forms of armament supervision which already exist in NATO (the Annual Review, the activities of the Standing Group agencies and the NATO Secretariat in the fields of standardization of arms and correlation of defence production, and the training and inspection responsibilities of the Supreme Commanders) should be strengthened and that a system of inspection should be set up in NATO under the authority of the Council. It was suggested that this control machinery might be established in progressive stages in order to introduce flexibility into the plan.

Views of our Missions

5. We have reviewed our previous memorandum in the light of the comments received from our missions abroad. One of the main objections raised has been that our plans would change the whole character and direction of NATO. Mr. Wilgress, in particular, is concerned lest the introduction of what he calls "the concept of limiting armaments" would result in a loss of direction and purpose in NATO, particularly at a time when member Governments are experiencing considerable difficulty in meeting their existing commitments.

6. In reply we would point out that our plan is not for "limiting" armaments but for controlling them and that such a system could work in both directions (either to limit or to maintain existing levels) according to individual circumstances. It is fairly evident, moreover, that there has already been some loss of momentum in NATO due in some part to the adoption of the "long haul" approach to NATO defence planning and in some part to the uncertainty surrounding the German defence contribution (which has been regarded by NATO as essential but has for so long failed to materialize). There is good reason to believe that our plan, if successful, would restore a positive purpose to the Alliance by obtaining willing German participation in the Atlantic Community, binding the Alliance more closely together and providing it with a flexible machinery capable of facilitating future NATO defence planning, whatever direction it might take. For these reasons it is our view that this plan, if properly presented to the public, would increase popular support for NATO rather than the contrary.

7. Our Ambassador in Bonn is in full agreement with our analysis of the underlying problem of Franco-German relations. He believes that since German support for the E.D.C. was based to a large extent on genuine support for the "European Idea", membership in NATO itself may not be a completely adequate substitute. He feels, however, that one of the main attractions of our plan is that under it Germany would adhere to the same "rules of the club" as the other members. A summary of German views following the failure of the E.D.C. is given in Annex "B".

8. Mr. [C.S.A.] Ritchie has made one suggestion which in our view might with advantage be incorporated in our proposals. He considers it important to secure from West Germany, as a prerequisite to admission to NATO, a guarantee that it will not attempt to re-unify Germany or recover the lost German territories in the East by force of arms. We think it would also be desirable to combine this with a parallel undertaking by West Germany to devote the whole of its defence effort to NATO, on the grounds that since West Germany, as a member of NATO, would have renounced the use of force in dealing with the question of its eastern frontiers, and since it has no overseas responsibilities, it can have no legitimate use for armed forces beyond those assigned for the defence of the NATO area. Such undertakings, which the Germans could hardly refuse to give, would of course furnish NATO with a powerful weapon in the propaganda war with the Communists.

9. From the comments we have so far received we have no reason to think that the French reaction to our plan would be unfavourable. In fact Mr. Wilgress has observed that Mendes-France, in advancing his amendments to the E.D.C. at Brussels, was proposing German membership in NATO in everything but name. An analysis of the French position following the failure of the EDC is given in Annex "A".

10. The most important reactions to our plan will, of course, be those of the United Kingdom and, more particularly, the United States. We have already had an opportunity to study in a preliminary way the United Kingdom plan for controlled German re-armament within NATO the text of which is contained in Annex "C".⁵⁶ It is interesting to note that this plan contemplates modifications in the existing NATO arrangements but that it would impose obligations on Germany additional to those assumed by the rest of the member countries. The United States is opposed to the United Kingdom scheme mainly on the grounds that it would result in a type of second-class membership for Western Germany which would not for long be acceptable to German public opinion.

11. Our missions have confirmed that it is extremely unlikely that the United States would be prepared to agree to the full inspection and control scheme described in our memorandum to you of July 16th. At the moment the United ⁵⁶ Le document britannique est réimprimé et appelé Document 315.

The British paper is reprinted as Document 315.

States appears to favour a new agreement between the Three Powers in Germany which would contain safeguards on German re-armament and at the same time would bind Germany to try to meet force goals set for it by NATO. Our chief objections to this approach are that it represents an attempt to solve an essentially NATO problem on a quadripartite basis only and that it is manifestly discriminatory against Germany.

Conclusions

12. I think the time has now come when we should explore urgently with our NATO partners the possibility of implementing a plan such as that outlined in our memorandum of July 16th, modified as might be necessary to command general support, as a preliminary to the admission of Germany to NATO. In doing so I would suggest that we put forward a series of variants of this plan, arranged in order of their scope. An indication of these variants is given briefly below:

Variant A: Inspection and control of all armed forces and all armaments (both conventional and atomic) in all NATO countries;

B: Inspection and control of armed forces and armaments actually assigned to NATO Commanders;

C: Inspection and control of armed forces and conventional armaments only in all NATO countries;

D: Inspection and control of all armed forces and armaments on the Continent of Europe;

E: Inspection and control of all armed forces and armaments in the E.D.C. countries.

13. It is recognized that Variant A, although ideally the best, is most unlikely to be even seriously considered, not to mention accepted, by the United States and the United Kingdom. At the other extreme the last two variants involve such a measure of discrimination that they hardly meet our requirements for a reasonably permanent solution. The most likely possibilities would, therefore, seem to be Variants B and C, of which the first appears to be by far the best. If Variant B were combined with a solemn undertaking by Germany that she would devote the whole of her defence effort to NATO, it would insure that all German armed forces and armaments were subject to NATO supervision, while leaving the most sensitive areas of United States and United Kingdom armament (the strategic air forces and the strategic reserves) and certain French forces outside its scope. The United States and United Kingdom would probably still object but might in the end be willing to accept it rather than risk the disintegration of NATO.

14. Variant C would be less satisfactory in that it would leave beyond NATO control German atomic development for military purposes (unless, of course, Germany renounces its right to produce atomic energy). This may not be a problem at present or for the immediate future but it is almost certain to become an important factor in a matter of years. Moreover, an undertaking not to enter the atomic energy field is likely before long to be regarded by the Germans as a far more humiliating limitation on their sovereignty than an undertaking to assign all their forces and armaments to NATO.

15. The latter type of undertaking would be a natural corollary to a pledge by the German Government that they will renounce force as a means of reuniting Germany or recovering the lost territories (see para. 8 above). Twin undertakings of this nature by Germany could be represented not as discrimination against Germany but merely as recognition of the key position of Germany between the Soviet Empire and the Western Powers and the necessity of insuring that this position will not be exploited to threaten either side. An alternative and possibly preferable form of undertaking by Germany might be that envisaged under the United Kingdom plan (annex "C" para. (d)) whereby all NATO members including Germany might agree that, apart from forces placed under SACEUR, no armed forces will be maintained except national police forces, troops for the protection of the Head of State, forces for international missions (e.g. UN) and "forces which any member required to fulfil its defence responsibilities in the North Atlantic area other than the European mainland or outside the NATO area".

16. As to a timetable, it would seem desirable, if you agree, to make known these views immediately in London and Washington, particularly since the State Department appears to have expressed genuine interest in the general lines of our thinking on German association with NATO and would be glad to examine our plan in more detail (telegram WA-1516 of September 2 from Washington).† In the circumstances, I suggest that our representatives explain:

(a) that these views represent the thinking of this Department and have your blessing;

(b) that they are not yet Canadian Government views;

(c) that if, after further study it appears desirable, we will put them forward at whatever NATO Council meeting is convened for the purpose of discussing the problem of a German defence contribution;

(d) that we are disturbed that both the United States and the United Kingdom appear to be going ahead with plans to restore German sovereignty before NATO has had an opportunity to consider seriously proposals for dealing with the problem of a German defence contribution.

17. If this course of action is agreeable, I would also suggest that, when instructions have been sent to London and Washington, copies of these instructions and of this memorandum be referred to our missions in the other NATO capitals and to the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff for any comments he may wish to make and that an early opportunity be taken to discuss our plan in the Cabinet Defence Committee. This consultation should not hold up our approach to London and Washington, in which speed is of the essence, but would be useful before proposals are put forward in the NATO forum. In addition, an effort will be made in this Department to study more closely the United Kingdom plan with the object of determining the extent to which some of its features are compatible with, if not adaptable to, our proposals.

FRENCH VIEWS FOLLOWING THE FAILURE OF E.D.C.

French opposition to E.D.C. in the National Assembly, which was characterized by a highly emotional content, crystallized on two points, according to the report from our Ambassador to France. These were:

- (1) The refusal of the United Kingdom to participate in E.D.C.
- (2) The rearmament of Germany linked to the limitation of French sovereignty.

2. Three important factors, which influenced the decision of the Assembly were as follows:

(1) The fear that the pattern of the second and third decades of the century would be repeated if Germany were again permitted to rearm. Mindful of recent history, the French wonder what will happen after the influence of Adenauer is removed from German politics. In the minds of many Frenchmen, the menace of Russia is not nearly as apparent as the potential menace of an armed Germany with irredentist aspirations in the East. They also remember three German invasions within eighty years, and animosity towards the Germans is presently being stimulated by war crimes trials in France.

(2) The French have resented intervention by the United States in their domestic politics in connection with the ratification of E.D.C. This resentment has been magnified to some extent by the existence of some anti-American feeling in France which stems from a number of causes. The recent efforts of United States officials, and particularly Mr. Dulles, in attempting to force the French Government into presenting E.D.C. to the National Assembly, and in endeavouring to have the Assembly approve the Treaty, resulted in increasing the antagonism of some deputies to the Treaty.

(3) In France there is wide-spread anti-clericalism among some sectors of the populace and this, of course, is reflected in the National Assembly. E.D.C. is supported in a large measure by Catholic parties (in France, Germany, Italy and The Netherlands) who, in a generic sense, have moderate right-wing political views or mild socialist leanings. The conception of a European Community influenced by a Roman Catholic political party is obnoxious, our Ambassador thinks, to a considerable number of anti-clericals in France.

3. The highly charged atmosphere in the French Assembly on the question of E.D.C. led to an emotional debate in which the highly technical Treaty was reduced to a few essentials, notwithstanding the lengthy and detailed reports of the various parliamentary committees which studied it. These reports, though unfavourable to the Treaty, were not studied in the Assembly at any length. It would appear, in the light of this experience, that any provision or any alternatives to E.D.C. providing for German sovereignty and rearmament might meet similar treatment in the National Assembly, and debate would centre on a few salient points.

4. The Mendes-France proposals submitted at Brussels lend substance to our view that the French would not be unwilling to have Germany rearmed within NATO. These proposals provided for an intimate though inferior relationship of E.D.C. to NATO. The protocol provided that all decisions relating to defence policy and likely to affect the E.D.C. as a whole would be taken unanimously by the NATO and E.D.C. Councils in joint session, which in effect would give Germany the right of attending NATO Meetings, and of veto in matters of major policy. There was also a provision that E.D.C. headquarters would be located in the same place as the NATO headquarters. A further French stipulation was that the United States and the United Kingdom would maintain forces on the European continent including Germany at an agreed ratio to those of the E.D.C. powers, as long as any threat to the security of Western Europe and the E.D.C. countries continued to exist.

5. An important part of the Mendes-France proposals dealt with the structure of E.D.C. According to these proposals, the functions of the various organs of the E.D.C. would be, briefly, as follows during the important "initial period" of the treaty (i.e. the first eight years):

(a) The Council of Ministers, the supreme authority, would take unanimous decisions if any member considered the questions involved affected national interests. In particular proposals to amend the E.D.C. Treaty must be approved unanimously by the Council.

(b) The Commissariat, the effective organ, would be directly responsible to the Council of Ministers, from which it would obtain directions, and would be limited to administrative functions not involving political decisions.

(c) The Commissariat would consist of: (i) a central organ; and (ii) territorial divisions in all the member countries, under deputies which would be nationals of the countries concerned. The function of these territorial divisions would be to co-ordinate with the national authorities concerned the measures required for implementation of the E.D.C. Treaty. However, the legislation and regulations of the member states in the defence field would remain in effect until E.D.C. provisions had been drawn up and agreed unanimously.

(d) The E.D.C. Court, which was originally intended to adjudicate on questions relating to the interpretation and application of the Treaty, would not have jurisdiction in disputes arising out of the functioning of the Commissariat in each state.

6. According to the Mendes-France proposals the military provisions of the E.D.C. would include the following:

(a) The concept of integration would apply only to the forces stationed in the "covering zone" (which would presumably include Western Germany and possibly other forward areas).

(b) Forces of non-E.D.C. members of NATO could participate in E.D.C. formations at the request of SACEUR and the non-E.D.C. states concerned.

7. The Mendes-France proposals also would introduce the following important modifications in the economic and financial arrangements of the E.D.C.:

(a) During the first complete fiscal year following the entry into force of the E.D.C. the contributions of the E.D.C. states would be determined not by the Commissariat but in accordance with the NATO procedure.

(b) Thereafter the procedure would be that first the member's contribution would be decided in national parliaments, that then a combined E.D.C. budget would be submitted by the Commissariat to the Council, which would have to approve it unanimously, and that this budget would be submitted for final approval to the Assembly, which could reject it or re-allocate within it but could not increase it.

8. If the Mendes-France proposals had been adopted the E.D.C. would have lost most, if not all, of its supranational characteristics and would have become an alliance similar but subordinate to NATO, though with certain additional organs (like the Assembly and the Court) whose functions would in practice be severely curtailed. The only area in which the E.D.C. would have functioned in a supranational way, as far as can be seen, would have been in the "covering zone", where there would have been an integrated E.D.C. force for the Commissariat to administer.

9. This examination would seem to lead to the conclusion that, provided NATO could exercise some control over the size of the German defence contribution, the French (or at least those prepared to support the Mendes-France proposals) would not oppose the admission of Germany to NATO.

10. The French, according to press reports, regard the new German policy, which was announced in a Cabinet Communiqué (see Annex "B") as a manoeuvre. This opinion would appear to be substantiated by the subsequent comments of the head of the Federal Government's press office, who stated that any impression gathered from the communiqué to the effect that the Germans wished France to be excluded from future negotiations on German sovereignty and rearmament was incorrect.

11. In their turn the French have suggested that some plan might be drawn up in which the United Kingdom would be able to participate with France, Germany and the other E.D.C. powers. This proposal would envisage a coalition of armies, and some degree of integration in armament industries, which would be facilitated by the already established ECSC. However, the United Kingdom has already refused to accept any control by ECSC though the French, according to press reports, think that the United Kingdom may possibly reconsider its views about closer association with France and Germany in Western European defence.

Annex B

GERMAN VIEWS FOLLOWING THE FAILURE OF EDC

Our Ambassador to the Federal Republic has reported that, contrary to the expected atmosphere of gloom, there is some "smug" satisfaction among officials of the German Foreign Ministry about the French rejection of EDC. This feeling has resulted from the record of German cooperation in regard to EDC and French lack of cooperation. It has been reflected in a press communiqué (see below) in which it would appear that France was deliberately snubbed.

2. At the same time Germany, according to press reports, is endeavouring to press for complete sovereignty in contrast to the type of sovereignty envisaged in the original EDC. A press communiqué issued after a meeting of the German Cabinet to discuss the French rejection of EDC made the following points:

(a) Continuation of the policy of seeking to unite Europe and consultations covering the further treatment of the question of military integration with countries that have already ratified EDC, or are about to ratify it.

(2) Restoration of the sovereignty of the Federal Republic.

(3) Participation by the Federal Republic in the Western defence system on a basis of equality.

(4) The conclusion of a legal settlement governing the stationing of troops in the Federal Republic by means of new conventions.

(5) Immediate negotiations between the Federal Republic and the United States and the United Kingdom (about these issues).

3. Our Ambassador also reports that he was informed that a prominent member of the Social Democrats (SPD) had stated that they would favour German participation in a coalition army within the framework of NATO and that reports that the SPD as a whole favoured a neutralized Germany were not accurate. The Social Democrats consider that such a contribution should be smaller than the French or United Kingdom contribution. However, they would not fully support German participation in NATO until it was clear that a Four Power Agreement on Germany could not be reached, on the basis of negotiations as proposed in the recent Soviet notes.

4. According to our Ambassador, Adenauer's position from an internal political standpoint has not been appreciably weakened by the failure of the French to ratify EDC and Germany's external position seems only to have been strengthened by events. Mr. Ritchie reports that there have been no very sharp criticisms of the Chancellor and the Government as a result of the failure of EDC; in fact there seems to be a tendency to applaud the Chancellor's handling of recent negotiations.

ADENAUER'S REACTIONS TO UNITED KINGDOM—UNITED STATES PROPOSALS

Johnston of the United Kingdom High Commission has told us Adenauer's reactions to the two protocols which were handed to him by Conant and by Hoyer Millar yesterday were decidedly unfavourable. The Chancellor said that the protocols contemplated so many restrictions being placed upon Germany that he could not agree to place them before the Bundestag. When Conant showed the protocols to the Chancellor, he told him that it was planned also to show them to the French. The Chancellor was very upset and because of this a dramatic last minute reversal of instructions had to be given to Jebb and to Dillon. Jebb kept his appointment with Mendes-France but was unable to discuss with him the principle reason for his visit.

2. Hoyer Millar also was authorized to ask for the Chancellor's opinion on two alternative plans which the United Kingdom Government considered as possible means by which Germany might be brought into the western defence system. He informed Adenauer that the United Kingdom Government favoured German membership in NATO with safeguards against unlimited German rearmament similar to those embodied in the EDC Treaty. As a second and less attractive alternative the United Kingdom Government had been exploring the possibility of a supernational organization along the lines of the EDC but looser in form in which the United Kingdom might also participate. Hoyer Millar explained that the United Kingdom Government had not, however, been able to arrive at any satisfactory formula for giving effect to the idea but that they would welcome any suggestions as to how this might be accomplished. Hoyer Millar also delivered a personal message from Churchill in which the United Kingdom Prime Minister suggested that Adenauer might consider a unilateral declaration by the Federal Government offering to restrict German forces to the level contemplated in the EDC Treaty.

3. The Chancellor appeared interested in and favourably impressed by the British proposals. He undertook to study them and to give his government's considered views on the question of German rearmament and on the problem of German sovereignty within the next few days. He was grateful he said at the evident care and thought which had gone into the British proposals. He indicated that German thinking had been along similar lines. Indeed he referred to a German plan which he said he hoped he would be in a position to discuss at the same time as he was able to comment upon the British suggestions.

NATO AND GERMAN RE-ARMAMENT; PROPOSED MINISTERIAL MEETING

Prior to the private session of the Council reported in our telegram, I was approached by Ed. Martin of the United States delegation, who asked for our views concerning (a) the site, and (b) the date, for the proposed Ministerial meeting. He explained that the State Department was considering the possibility of holding the meeting in the United States, and was thinking of the beginning of October as a likely date. I said I had no instructions on the question of a site but personally would consider a trans-Atlantic site a mistake as the task in hand was to obtain voluntary cooperation among the Europeans. On this count, and for convenience, I thought Paris or London might be more suitable. Martin said that he and the delegation here were disposed to agree with me that a trans-Atlantic site might be a mistake, but they were putting forward the idea of a meeting in Rome. He did not know how strong the feeling in Washington might be on the matter of crossing the ocean, but he thought no definite position had yet been taken.

2. As for the date, I outlined your position as given to the Council later, and reported in our telegram under reference.

3. Following the meeting I talked to Steel, who was concerned both about our statement and about the site for the meeting. He said that the negotiations must include the Benelux powers and Italy, whose foreign policies were so vitally dependent upon the whole EDC-German question. Hence a negotiating conference involving only Germany, the United Kingdom, the United States and France was out of the question. But if the group were expanded to include Canada it would be very difficult to reject the claims of Denmark and hence of Norway. Expansion to this degree would produce an impossible isolation of Greece, Iceland, Portugal and Turkey. This was the line of thought which had led to the United Kingdoms eight-power suggestion.

4. As for the site, Steel was strongly opposed to a trans-Atlantic city. He said he thought Rome would be the best choice, particularly as it would serve to buck up the Italians at a difficult time for them. London would be another possibility. I mentioned Athens, on the ground that the next chairman will be a Greek, but it has since occurred to me that this would undoubtedly give rise to undesirable speculation about Yugoslavia and might make life still more difficult for the Italians. I gathered that Paris was regarded as unacceptable to the United States and in any case, it has occurred to me since that the choice of Paris as a site would probably create serious difficulties for Adenauer in obtaining acceptance in Germany of any solution which might emerge.

5. My own ideas about timing run along the following lines. To act as umbrella for an actual negotiating party, a Council meeting would have to take place too soon to permit the assembling of Ministers. Thus the initial Council examination should be at permanent representative level and could take place sometime next week — perhaps Wednesday or Thursday, September 8 or 9. It could be followed by the negotiating conference, whether as a NATO working party of governments or constituted in some other way, beginning a week or two later. The results of the conferences' labours could then be considered at a Ministerial meeting in the first half of October, at which time if fortune smiles, it might be possible to reach a formal decision on the solution of the German re-armament question.

6. An important factor in the choice of a date for the Ministerial meeting is that fact that Mendes-France term as Chairman of the NATO Council will end on September 18. Both the United Kingdom and the United States do not trust him sufficiently to wish him to occupy the chair during this proposed meeting.

7. A difficulty in all of this is the French position. During the recent debate Mendes-France made clear his view that German sovereignty, except in regard to re-armament, must be restored in the immediate future, and that shortly thereafter agreement must be found on a German re-armament plan. But he was compelled to agree that he would recall the Assembly to consider any new proposals on the German question. How far his parliamentary commitments might interfere with the timetable outlined above, I am unable to judge at present. Questions of timetable aside, it would still be rash to predict in any but the most speculative terms (see our letter No. 2484 of August 19) what sort of agreement France might accept.

8. I shall take up in another telegram the question of the actual solution to be sought for the substantive problem. In the meantime I should be grateful for your comments on the questions of site and date of the Ministerial meeting and on the timetable outlined in my paragraph 4 above.

NATO AND GERMAN RE-ARMAMENT

Assuming that there is a NATO Council meeting at the Permanent Representative level within the next week or so to take up the German question, I think that we should put forward the formula for convoking under NATO auspices a working group of governments consisting of "countries signatory to E.D.C. or maintaining defence forces in Germany". The function of such a working group would be to seek an acceptable plan providing for the restoration of German sovereignty and the provision of a German contribution to the western defence programme, and to delineate the relationship between Germany and NATO under this plan through the preparation of some document such as a draft protocol to the North Atlantic Treaty.

Composition

2. In supporting the formula for the composition of the working group, I have had in mind the concern expressed in your telegram No. 1291 to London and related correspondence. It is certainly true that any solution which may emerge from the working group is likely to be somewhat fragile until it has become generally accepted through use. In these circumstances, any country not a member of the working group would have very little scope to suggest modifications at the time that the plan was put forward in a NATO Ministerial meeting, for fear of upsetting a delicately balanced applecart. On the other hand, it appears to me an over-riding consideration that the working group which will have a very difficult task indeed, should be so arranged as to give it every possible prospect of success. The consequences of failure in such a working group would be so critical that in my view only the most vital considerations should alter the formula for its composition from that most likely to lead to agreement. In spite of Steel's objections reported in my telegram No. 656 of September 3, I do not think we should refrain from seeking an expansion to a nine or ten power membership, but if our suggestion encounters serious opposition, I think we should not press it too hard.

Agenda

3. Despite the tendency on the part of the United Kingdom and the United States up to the present to deal with the German question in two stages (the first the restoration of sovereignty and the second the re-armament question), I consider that it would be preferable to place the two problems simultaneously before the proposed working group. There are such obvious connections between the two that it appears somewhat artificial to separate them. It is doubtful, moreover, as suggested in para 3 of Canada House's telegram No. 1299,[†] whether Adenauer would accept a two-phase programme. It has been suggested (see para 2 of Bonn telegram No. 236 of September 2)[†] that the Germans might be willing to accept the two-phase approach specifically for the reason that it would remove a French veto on German re-armament; for exactly the same reason, I suspect the French might be unwilling. Hoyer-Millar's approach to Adenauer (Canada House telegram No. 1072 of September 3) with a probable sounding of reactions to German admission to NATO, suggests that the United Kingdom may now have veered away from the two-stage approach.

4. If there is any prospect of agreement concerning these two major problems, there will inevitably be the question of preparing some operative document (such as a draft protocol) which would serve to make explicit the terms of the agreement.

Possible Terms of Agreement

5. The general line which it appears is likely to be followed by the United Kingdom is set out in the working paper reported in Canada House telegram No. 1038 of August 26. This paper is generally in accord with our own thinking here, and to a large extent serves to put in precise form the pattern broadly outlined in our letter No. 2484 of August 19 (see, for example, paragraphs 15, 16 and 19 of that letter). We find ourselves substantially in agreement with the points made in para 2 under sections (a),(b),(d),(e),(f),(g), and (h).

6. The suggestion in section (c) for a European arms pool is an interesting one. Such a plan might find some real support in France as there has been a body of French parliamentary opinion which for some time had promoted a scheme of this sort as an alternative to E.D.C. The general idea might serve to mitigate the hostility of the European integrationists. While it would not seriously impinge upon the sovereignty of any state concerned, it would strengthen the internal position of the United Kingdom Government in that it would provide for a commitment linking the European powers to which the United Kingdom would not have to be a party. This would meet in fairly innocuous form the separatist position which has had so much to do with Britain's refusal to join the E.D.C., and which may in some ways be regarded as the basic cause for the failure of the latter. On the other hand, if the United Kingdom pushes this suggestion too hard, it may merely infuriate those Europeans whose opposition to EDC has been based to a considerable extent on the haughty detachment which they have attributed to Great Britain in its attitude toward that treaty. On the whole, I would see no harm in the United Kingdom putting forward this suggestion, and then allowing the EDC signatories a free choice as to whether or not they should apply it.

5. Section (f) of the United Kingdom paper raises a rather delicate point. In the purely military sense, the maintenance of Canadian forces on the Continent can contribute very little to the security of Germany's neighbors. Nevertheless the political value of a commitment by Canada as well as the United States and the United Kingdom might be considerable, particularly in France. We do not know what the Canadian Government's position might be with regard to possible assurances on this point, as previous consideration of the matter has always related directly to the EDC. It has been easy enough for us to say we have no direct responsibility toward the EDC, but the position might be different with regard to a NATO-wide scheme for German re-armament.

6. Subject to the points raised in my two preceding paras, I believe that the United Kingdom paper represents a sound approach to the problem. I agree that admission of Germany to NATO is the best alternative to EDC, and that this can best be achieved through the negotiation of special terms of admission. For the most part, the terms proposed by the United Kingdom appear to me satisfactory, although it is clear that flexibility may be required in the course of the negotiations.

Action Required

7. I should be grateful to receive your instructions as soon as possible on the proposal in my first paragraph. We should also be glad to learn of the development of your thinking on the broader aspects of this problem, as indicated in para 4 of your letter No. S-482 of July 20.⁵⁷

NATO AND GERMAN REARMAMENT

Nye who is now back in Canada has been instructed to inform you of present state of United Kingdom thinking in the light of last week's diplomatic exchanges. They are now thinking of a nine power meeting in London in the week of September 13th and are so informing Washington, and the EDC signatories. Inter alia they are telling them that they see no reason why the eight power meeting originally envisaged should not be expanded into a nine power meeting by the invitation of Canada "as a country with substantial armed forces stationed in Germany". They do not think Denmark need be invited since her military contribution is insignificant and her presence would raise difficulties vis-à-vis Norway in particular.

2. They do not regard such a meeting as preventing the permanent NATO representatives from also considering these problems in restricted Council session beginning, if this is desired, next week. They do feel however that it would be a mistake to start with a full dress Ministerial meeting of NATO before there is some prospect of definite decisions in regard to German association with the west and to a German defence contribution. Moreover they attach over-riding importance to the fact that while Germany must be fully consulted from the earliest stage, it cannot yet be invited to a NATO Council meeting.

NATO AND GERMAN REARMAMENT

We believe that the plan now proposed by the United Kingdom is the best that can be obtained. The weakness in the suggestion made in our telegram under reference is that NATO cannot formally establish a working group to include Germany; hence the best that could be obtained at a meeting of the Permanent Council this week is a decision to "note with approval the proposal for a meeting" and ask the NATO powers concerned to keep the Council informed of developments.

It has occurred to us that if a nine-power meeting is called, as proposed by the United Kingdom, then Canada would be included by virtue of her special interest in the question and not through any mechanical formula. If we accept such a proposal we will by implication be accepting a significant measure of responsibility with regard to the results of the meeting. This would mean that we may be under considerable pressure to make some sort of guarantee in relation to an agreed solution. In other words, the question discussed in para 5 of our telegram under reference would become more important than if the ten-power formula for membership of the meeting were to be used. It does not appear, however, that the United Kingdom is prepared to extend the meeting beyond the nine-power limit.

GERMAN REARMAMENT AND NATO

Our preference for a NATO discussion of the problem of a German defence contribution is not incompatible with the United Kingdom plan to have an 8, 9, or 10-power meeting. In fact, both the NATO Council and a special conference in London could, we think, be seized of what is in essence the same problem, bearing in mind the point raised in the last sentence of paragraph 1 sub-paragraph 5 of our telegram 1297 of September 2, regarding German sovereignty. We should make sure however that the North Atlantic Council will not, repeat not, be used solely to ratify agreements already reached elsewhere. In this context the assurances given by the Foreign Office to the effect that "the (London) meeting would not be intended to make final decisions, but to reach agreement on lines on which experts should work with a view to a full meeting of NATO later" appear satisfactory. (para. 3 of CRO Telegram 891 of September 5).

2. We consider that a regular Council meeting on September 8 or 9 should be held to explore in a general way the question of possible German association with NATO and a German defence contribution. At this meeting we should reiterate our view that no decisions on these matters can be made outside NATO itself — and that any such meeting as that proposed for London is preliminary consultation only, and related to the necessity of bringing Germany into the discussions at once, something presumably that cannot be done at this moment through attendance at such a NATO meeting. Our role if we were invited to this London meeting would be influenced by the nature of discussions in Paris.

3. In the event the talks in London are primarily concerned with the problem of a German defence contribution or German admission to NATO, we shall be prepared to take an active part; on the other hand, if the meeting should be concerned with some form of a looser EDC arrangement which, according to information from Bonn (telegram No. 239 of September 3) also seems to be under consideration, we may then wish to decide to play a less active role in the discussions.

4. As far as the date of the proposed London meeting is concerned, we would see considerable merit in having the talks commence on the 15th or 16th, rather than the 13th or 14th. If such a slight postponement were possible, it would permit us to examine in greater detail the views of the other NATO members on the general question of a German defence contribution. In addition, it is possible that before the beginning of next week we may be in a position, after discussions in London and Washington, to bring a plan for armament control to the attention of other NATO members in the expectation that it might be examined by any working group which may be set up either by NATO or the London conference.

5. On the question of a full ministerial council meeting, we share the United Kingdom view that it should not be held in New York, but in Europe. The date need not be set now since it will depend in a large measure on the progress made during the London conference.

6. (FOR CANADA HOUSE ONLY) I would be grateful if you could bring these views immediately to the attention of the Foreign Office.

7. (FOR CANAC ONLY) The above should serve as guidance for the Council meeting scheduled for the 8th or 9th. We are attempting to send you more detailed views on procedure — generally we are in agreement with those you have expressed in your recent messages.

NATO AND GERMAN REARMAMENT

At the request of the United States the private session of the Council on September 7 was preceded by a restricted formal session. The United States Government wished to propose that a Ministerial meeting of the Council should be convened as soon as possible after October 1, at any time and place which might be mutually agreed. If this proposal were acceptable the United States would suggest that the time and place be decided and announced as soon as possible. The United States had not as yet definite views on the agenda except that the prime purpose of the meeting would be to note and to give consideration to the serious situation created by the French Assembly's rejection of the E.D.C. plan.

2. Ultimately the Council reached agreement in principle on this proposal, but in the course of the discussion a great deal of attention was given to the proposed preliminary meeting to be attended by a number of NATO powers and by Germany. This matter was immediately raised by Portugal which appeared to object strongly to the apparent exclusion from this preliminary meeting of a number of NATO countries. Portugal was firmly supported by Norway which argued that the failure of the E.D.C. had caused the German problem to revert to NATO as a whole. The opposite position was taken by the Netherlands supported by Belgium and Italy. Greece (and perhaps surprisingly, Denmark) appeared to be neutral. The major powers did not intervene in this particular discussion, but undertook in each case to report the points raised to their governments.

3. While the tone remained friendly, the rival positions were so strongly held that a serious impasse appeared to threaten. Accordingly, we intervened in order to outline a procedure which we suggested might meet all views. We said we were sure that our government would favour a Ministerial meeting about October 1, and there appeared to be general agreement that this was desirable. We suggested that all could agree also that the most careful preparations for this meeting would be necessary, and that such preparations would include exploratory discussions with the Germans. Accordingly, we considered that the best course would be to hold a general discussion of the question in the Permanent Council in the near future, at which time those countries who would be participating in the talks with the Germans would outline the ideas with which they would enter those talks. All members of the Council would have the opportunity to put forward the general views of their governments on the entire problem, but obviously no decisions could be taken in the absence of adequate information concerning the German position. Having thus available the preliminary views of all NATO governments, as worked out in collective discussion, the powers most directly concerned would then conduct exploratory discussions with the Germans in order to determine the German position and try to see possible lines of solution. They would of course keep the Council completely informed throughout the talks with the Germans. Following such exploratory talks, there would take place the NATO Ministerial session at which possible alternative solutions could be discussed and a decision reached.

4. The programme which we suggested clearly commanded fairly general support at least to the extent that no one objected to it and that those countries who would be participating in the German discussions actively supported it. It was agreed that the matter should be discussed again at the Council meeting on Thursday morning (September 9) at which time it was hoped that a firm decision could be reached concerning the proposed Ministerial meeting. A number of governments (particularly the United States and Norway) were anxious that a place and an exact date for the Ministerial meeting could be decided and announced in the near future, but others (especially the Netherlands) while not disagreeing with the phrase "as soon as possible after October 1" considered that some flexibility concerning the date should be left to take account of possible developments at the preliminary meeting with the Germans. Van Vredenburg immediately pointed out that for housekeeping purposes the Secretariat would need to know a fairly exact date as soon as possible.

5. In concluding the discussion and summing up the tentative agreement obtained on the points outlined above, Ismay announced that Mendes-France would take the chair at the meeting on September 9, and would briefly address the Council at that time. He would not be able to remain throughout the duration of the Council's business session.

NATO AND GERMAN RE-ARMAMENT

1. Your paragraph 7 appears to assume that arrangements have already been made for discussion of the German question during this week by the Permanent Council. As you will note from our telegram No. 673, no such decision has been taken although all or almost all members of the Council appear favourably disposed to such a plan. At the session this morning, in suggesting a possible time-table (see paragraph 3 of our telegram No. 673), I mentioned that the country sponsoring the limited meeting with the Germans might wish to take the lead in arranging such a discussion in the Permanent Council. In the absence of Steel his alternate did not take this up, however, and thus no definite proposal has yet been made.

2. Some at least of the Council members no doubt expect us to make such a proposal, as a logical consequence of our démarche reported in your telegram No. 593 of September 2. We have not wished to do so without your instructions, however, as such action would commit us to a leading role in the discussion. While such a role would not be in conflict with the instructions in your telegram No. 601, it would tend to commit us at a later stage to a fairly active part in the subsequent talks in London. All of this relates to the point made in paragraph 2 of our telegram No. 663 of September 6.

3. Please let us know, therefore, if you wish us formally to request a Council discussion of the German question. Such a discussion should take place prior to the London talks, which we believe are likely to begin not earlier than September 14 and not later than September 16. As delegations will undoubtedly wish for a few days to obtain instructions, the date would appear to be in the range September 11 to 13. We would favour September 11, in order to allow the results of the discussion to be taken into consideration by governments in preparing for the London talks.

4. On the whole we think it would be desirable for the United Kingdom to ask for the discussion rather than ourselves. This could no doubt be suggested either to the Foreign Office or the delegation here. In any case, whatever action you may wish to take should be taken rapidly in view of the timing considerations mentioned in our previous paragraph.

5. In any case, we would hope to receive prior to such a discussion somewhat more comprehensive instructions than are given in your telegram No. 601. As this will be the only NATO discussion prior to the London talks, from which the final solution (if any) will in all probability emerge, and as we have played a leading role in demanding the discussion, we will be under a considerable obligation to express a view as to the kind of solution which should be sought in London. My own views have been set out in our letter No. 2484 of August 19 and in our telegram No. 661 of September 4. Although we have made several requests, we have not yet received the further elaboration promised in paragraph 4 of your letter No. S-482 of July 20.† I would not wish to enter a discussion such as that envisaged in paragraph 2 of your telegram No. 601 without a fuller account of your current views than that given in paragraphs 3 and 4 of the same telegram on the final solution to be sought.

NATO, EDC AND GERMAN REARMAMENT

The plan set out in our memorandum for the Minister of July 16 has now been modified somewhat. Having these modifications in mind, you should discuss it with the State Department (for London substitute "Foreign Office") at your earliest opportunity stressing that it is not designed to limit armament but to control it and that a system along the lines we propose could work in both directions (either to limit or to maintain existing levels) according to individual circumstances. The modified version in the form of a memorandum for the Minister outlining our approach in detail is going forward by today's bag. In the meantime we are setting out in this message its salient points which you may regard as your instructions in presenting our views to the State Department (for London substitute "Foreign Office").

2. The main considerations outlined in our memorandum of July 16 (especially paragraph 4 and 5 and Annex A) are in our view still applicable in the light of recent developments. We firmly believe that the best solution to the twin problems of German sovereignty and a German defence contribution which offers some prospect of permanency is one involving the admission of a sovereign Germany to NATO after there has been instituted in NATO as a whole a system of armament control adequate to safeguard against a resurgence of German militarism. Any restrictions on German sovereignty retained as a condition on Germany's admission to NATO are unlikely to last for long and the strains among member countries which their removal would create might disintegrate the Alliance. Whatever controls on German rearmament we consider essential should be so established that they appear non-discriminatory, or as nearly so as possible.

3. In the circumstances, I suggest that in your presentation of this plan you should use as a basis the Departmental memorandum for the Minister of July 16 incorporating the idea that this plan should be viewed as a series of variants which might be arranged, in the order of their scope, as follows:

Variant A: Inspection and control of all armed forces and all armaments (both conventional and atomic) on all NATO countries;

B: Inspection and control of armed forces and armaments actually assigned to NATO Commanders;

C: Inspection and control of armed forces and conventional armaments only in all NATO countries;

D: Inspection and control of all armed forces and armaments on the Continent of Europe;

E: Inspection and control of all armed forces and armaments in the EDC countries.

4. Since Variant A, although ideally the best, is we believe, unacceptable at the present time, it could be discarded from the outset. The last two variants involve such a measure of discrimination that they hardly meet our requirements for a reasonably permanent solution.

5. Variant B in our view is by far the best solution, particularly if it were combined with a solemn undertaking by Germany that she would devote the whole of her defence effort to NATO. This would ensure that all German armed forces and armaments were subject to NATO supervision while leaving the most sensitive areas of the United States and United Kingdom armament (the strategic air forces and the strategic reserves) and certain French forces outside its scope.

6. This type of undertaking would be a natural corollary to a pledge by the German Government that they will renounce force as a means of reuniting Germany or recovering the lost territories. Twin undertakings of this nature by Germany could be represented not as discrimination against Germany but merely as recognition of the key position of Germany between the Soviet Empire and the Western Powers and the necessity of insuring that this position will not be exploited to threaten either side. An alternative and possibly preferable form of undertaking by Germany might be that envisaged under the United Kingdom plan (para. (d), London telegram 1038 of August 26).

7. Variant C would be less satisfactory in that it would leave beyond NATO control German atomic development for military purposes (unless, of course, Germany renounces its right to produce atomic energy). This may not be a problem at present or for the immediate future but it is almost certain to become an important factor in a matter of a few years. Moreover, an undertaking not to enter the atomic energy field is likely before long to be regarded by the Germans as a far more humiliating limitation on their sovereignty than an undertaking to assign all their forces and armaments to NATO.

8. Accordingly, I would be grateful if you could bring these views to the attention of the State Department (for London substitute "Foreign Office") at your earliest opportunity explaining

(a) that these views are submitted with the full support of the Minister;

(b) that they are not yet Canadian Government views;

(c) that if after further study it appears desirable, we will put them forward at whatever NATO Council meeting is convened for the purpose of discussing the problem of a German defence contribution;

(d) that we would be disturbed at both the United States and United Kingdom going ahead with plans to restore German sovereignty before NATO has had an opportunity to consider seriously proposals for dealing with the problem of a German defence contribution (although we recognize their exclusive responsibility in this matter).

Please let us know as soon as possible the initial reaction of the State Department (for London substitute "Foreign Office"). For the time being, the plan is being submitted only to London and Washington.

NATO AND GERMAN REARMAMENT

We are glad that your efforts to avoid a serious impasse during the preliminary discussions in the Council on this subject have been successful and we are deeply indebted to you for keeping us so fully informed.

2. We have purposely avoided any definite instructions to you concerning Canadian initiative with respect to a Council discussion on a German defence contribution pending some indication of the reaction of other NATO members to the approach made by our Missions (circular telegram of September 2 addressed to you as No. 593). We felt that an examination of the reactions to our approach and of your reports on preliminary Council discussions would be necessary before deciding on a course of action, particularly since it seemed possible that one of the other NATO members might, of its own accord, choose to take the initiative.

3. There are at the moment four main considerations which are influencing our thinking:

(a) Most important is that the problem of a German defence contribution should be recognized as being primary responsibility of NATO; the first step in its solution should, therefore, be consideration in the North Atlantic Council (Permanent Representatives).

(b) There would be no objection to later consideration in a more restricted meeting, but it should be preliminary and purely consultative in character, should be under NATO auspices and the NATO powers not represented should agree generally to holding it.

(c) Sufficient time should be allowed before initial consideration in the North Atlantic Council at Ministerial level, so that the considered views of all concerned can be expressed.

(d) We would not wish of course failure to hold a restricted meeting in London to be interpreted as a diplomatic setback for the United Kingdom.

4. Possibly the best way to deal with those consideration would be for the United Kingdom to take the initiative in placing the question of a German defence contribution on the conference agenda. Such action would, in our view, serve to re-emphasize and clarify their support of the principle involved (i.e., that a German defence contribution is essentially a NATO problem) and at the same time serve to pacify those members (e.g., Norway and Portugal) who have been opposed to the idea of a London meeting. In addition United Kingdom initiative in bringing this question before the NATO Council could place a London conference (if it materialized) in proper perspective in the sense that the United Kingdom might explain that a meeting in London would only work out the broad lines of any solution and that the final decision would be the responsibility of NATO. It would be preferable if we ourselves could avoid taking the further initiative of placing this matter on the Council agenda, particularly since we have already taken steps to make our views known on the question of the principle involved.

5. A recent report from London (telegram 1105 of September 8) suggests that Chancellor Adenauer seems to be veering towards the position that the whole question should be handled by the North Atlantic Council without direct German participation, and that he is in favour of avoiding any precipitate action by the Council in order to avoid another Brussels fiasco. On the basis of this German reaction and the lukewarm reception in Washington to the Foreign Office proposal for a London meeting, it seems more and more evident that the London meeting will be either postponed or abandoned. In the circumstances the United Kingdom may be favourably disposed towards any suggestion by us that they take the initiative in raising the question of a German defence contribution in the Council. If you agree, I suggest therefore that you should make an approach to your United Kingdom colleague, and we shall at the same time inform the Foreign Office and the State Department of our action. You should we think mention to Steel that if and when the Council meeting is held we would be prepared to steer the discussion in the direction of our earlier proposal that NATO should sponsor or at least approve the idea that some of its members (preferably the three Occupying Powers) should discuss the question of a German defence contribution with Chancellor Adenauer. You will, of course, make it clear that our main concern is to have a full and frank discussion in the Council at some mutually convenient date which will allow all NATO governments adequate time to prepare instructions for their members on the Council.

6. You should therefore speak to Steel along these lines. In the event that the United Kingdom is not inclined to take the initiative, it is possible that the Secretary-General, Lord Ismay, might place the subject on the agenda, particularly when the Council, in effect, has already been seized of the problem. If the Secretary-General should not see fit to take such action it is possible that the Norwegians might either choose or be persuaded to raise the issue. As a last resort you should do it yourself.

7. In your discussions with your U.S. colleague you may assume that Washington is aware of our views expressed in our telegrams of September 2 and 7.

8. In tomorrow's discussion, you may wish to use appropriate excerpts from the Minister's speech at Toronto yesterday (our telegram to you No. 603 of September 7).

9. London. Please speak along same lines to Foreign Office.

10. Washington. You may use above information at your discretion in speaking to State Department.

TELEGRAM 1131

London, September 10, 1954

SECRET & PERSONAL. IMMEDIATE.

Following for the Minister from Robertson, Begins: I saw the Foreign Secretary this morning, who gave me, for your private information, an outline of the ideas he will take with him on his consultations with the EDC countries. He was not sending any papers before him to any of the capitals he planned to visit. He did not propose to give any press conferences before his return to London on Thursday next, nor did he expect to have any opportunity of seeing any Commonwealth or allied diplomatic representatives during his round of consultations with the several host countries. If you wanted to get anything to him during the next week, he thought this could be most quickly and easily arranged through the Foreign Office.

2. He was hopeful that before his departure he could get the Prime Minister's consent to the United Kingdom stepping up the forces formally and permanently committed to SACEUR from the one division promised during the negotiations that were hoped to prepare the way for the ratification of EDC to say, three divisions. Churchill is still reluctant to agree to the United Kingdom assuming an obligation in Europe which would have no exact American counterpart, but Eden was trying to persuade him that such an undertaking by the United Kingdom would not only make it easier for the European allies to accept Germany as a NATO partner, but would strengthen the prospects of continued American cooperation in European defence. He thought that if he could get the Prime Minister's approval to such an offer, the rest of the Cabinet would quickly concur.

3. He attaches a good deal of political importance to the suggestion that the Brussels Treaty might be revised to permit of the entry of Germany and Italy. He will try this out in the first instance in Brussels. If the Benelux countries do not like it, he will not pursue it further. If they do, he does not think that Mendes-France is likely to oppose it. The Italians are expected to welcome it and the Germans have already, in a quite different context, made some enquiries as to how they could share in the social and cultural programmes, interchange of educational opportunities etc., which the Brussels Treaty countries have worked out between them under its auspices.

4. He showed me a message he had received yesterday from Dulles.⁵⁸ It was very frank and forthcoming in explaining the difficulty he would have in coming to Europe at this moment, but ended up with an offer to try to come to London the week-end of the 18-20th to discuss the situation with Eden and Adenauer and "perhaps Mendes-France" if Eden thought that consultation at this stage would be helpful. Eden feels strongly that Mendes-France should be included in any such meeting, if it materializes, and has told Dulles that he will send him further word from Bonn if, after his talks with Adenauer, he feels that a preliminary meeting between Germany and the occupying powers is desirable at this time. Eden is still thinking in terms of a nine power meeting rather than a smaller one, and would not like to start discussions without Benelux or Italy. He seemed particularly concerned about the internal political effects of the omission of Italy from any group of countries to be consulted, perhaps particularly because the problems of Trieste were also on his desk this morning, with the Italians and the Yugoslavs still deadlocked over about two square kilometers of territory across the harbour from Trieste.

5. Eden had not yet had a chance to go over the papers we left with Frank Roberts last night, but he had remembered his conversation with you on this subject in Ottawa in July, and said the United Kingdom would be extremely interested in studying how you had developed the idea of an armaments control built into NATO. He anticipated that difficulties would be made by the United States and probably by his own military advisers, but he thought that even if its application had to be worked out first among the European members of NATO, it might simplify the job of getting Germany in.

6. Eden asked me how worried we were about developments in the Formosan situation. He did not like the look of things very much and felt this was no time for the rather light-hearted skirmishing that had been going on over Quemoy. I tried out on him something of the line of argument in my letter to you, which he seemed to find quite congenial. Ends.

NATO AND GERMAN REARMAMENT

In the Council meeting of September 9 (our telegram No. 681 of September 10),[†] there was renewed controversy (our telegram No. 673 of September 7) concerning the procedure to be followed in negotiating a solution to the problem created by the French Assembly's rejection of EDC. There was general agreement that this was a NATO problem, to be resolved if possible by a Ministerial meeting early in October and to be discussed in substance in the immediate future by the NATO Permanent Council. But beyond that there was no full meeting of minds.

2. It was generally accepted that speed was essential, and also (Ismaï pointed out that these two desiderata were in conflict) that careful preparation for the Ministerial meeting was imperative. Obviously, such preparation involved exploratory conversations with the Germans, but agreement was lacking on how and by whom these talks should be conducted.

3. The heart of the opposition was Norway and Portugal. The former argued that all NATO members were equally interested in obtaining an acceptable means whereby Germany could participate in western defence arrangements, and that therefore all should engage in the exploratory talks with the Germans. Portugal, on the other hand, while agreeing with Norway that no country's interest could be overlooked, was prepared to leave the exploratory talks to the occupying powers. This suggestion, which was supported by reference to the Canadian démarche (your telegram No. 593 of September 2, paragraph 1(5)), was vigorously rejected by Belgium, the Netherlands (supported by the United States) and by Norway as well, none of whom could accept the concept of a "political standing group". (The Netherlands afterwards expressed annoyance concerning our démarche as having encouraged Norway and Portugal in their demands for participation by all, or none, of the countries not having occupation rights in Germany.)

4. I understand that in the course of the day Robertson intervened again in London to ensure that Steel would take the initiative in settling this problem. He strongly supported the case for an intermediate stage (between Permanent Representative exchange of views and the Ministerial meeting) consisting of a restricted but broadly based group which would explore possibilities with the Germans. He explained that such discussions would involve (a) renegotiation au fond of arrangements to cover foreign forces in Germany and (b) safeguards on German rearmament. He argued that the membership should logically be (a) countries who would have forces in Germany (which would not include Denmark after a German defence contribution) and (b) those neighbours of Germany who were prepared to make sacrifices to ensure that her rearmament would be subject to effective control.

5. Steel also agreed that the United Kingdom would be willing throughout such negotiations to keep NATO informed of developments and would welcome the expression of views by all other countries concerned (whether directly or indirectly) on the issues involved. He finally suggested that an initial general discussion should take place on Monday, September 13, but it was not clear whether he was forced into this or was acting on instructions.

6. In my intervention, I (a) supported Steel, the Netherlands and Belgium on the general issues and on the procedure which appeared most realistic; (b) re-iterated the need for a group smaller than NATO's total which should hold exploratory talks with the Germans; (c) asserted our view that all developments should be reported to the Council as they occurred and should be discussed there so that NATO views would at all stages be available to all concerned; (d) made the distinction between "interest" and "responsibilities" relating to Germany and tied the latter to the maintenance of forces and to the EDC; (e) referred to the special responsibilities concerning German sovereignty of the occupying powers and, thus, explained our reference (see paragraph 3 above) to them.

7. I supported the United Kingdom suggestion for an early discussion of the substantive issues involved and (referring to your September 7 speech) outlined our preliminary views. I spoke of the dual requirements of speed and the avoidance of another failure, pointing out that we had something closer to four weeks than to the four years which had elapsed since the first Council discussion of German rearmament. The EDC had been bold and imaginative — perhaps too much so — and had had as primary objects: (1) the furtherance of European integration; (2) a Franco-German rapprochement; and (3) a German defence contribution. Its failure had seriously retarded (1), but we must now in caution ensure rapid progress on (2) and (3). This could be best accomplished through German admission to NATO under suitable safeguards, as the alternative of including Germany in a looser European defence association which the United Kingdom might possibly join would involve unduly protracted negotiations. We would hope that this would assist in further steps toward European integration and, in the meantime, it offered the course which would ensure our minimum immediate objectives.

8. After further inconclusive discussion, it was agreed that a meeting would be held about the middle of next week to examine the substance of the problem involved in obtaining a German defence contribution. It was hoped that Permanent Representatives would by that time be prepared to give as full an indication as possible of their government's views. We believe that such a discussion may take place on September 14 or 15, and in a separate telegram are discussing the line which we might take.

NATO AND GERMAN REARMAMENT

After a good deal of wavering and confusion on procedural aspects, we believe that the Council's decision reported in our telegram to hold a full-scale discussion about the middle of next week on the problem of obtaining a German defence contribution is completely in accord with your wishes. We also believe that the developments which have led up to this decision impose on us a considerable obligation to participate constructively in that discussion.

2. Our initiative in formally requesting in all NATO capitals that the problem should be handled directly by NATO has certainly contributed to the controversy over the proposed nine-power meeting. Whether or not that meeting takes place (and Eden's intended tour of EDC capitals now makes it somewhat unlikely) and whether or not Canada takes part in it, we believe that we should do all that we can to make the discussion in the Council a real and fruitful one. This follows both from our démarche to NATO capitals and from our consistent policy that the NATO Council should be used as the regular forum for exchanging views and seeking solutions on major political problems of this type. The case will be all the stronger if the plan for a nine-power meeting should be dropped.

3. In our statement on September 9 (see our telegram No. 682 of September 10, paragraph 7) we outlined preliminary Canadian views as expressed in your speech of September 7.⁵⁹ Nevertheless these preliminary views, and the similar indication of United Kingdom thinking provided by Steel, related to general principles. In themselves, such principles are certainly important, if only because there has as yet been given to the Council no indication of whether or not such principles are acceptable to the French Government. On this matter of general principles, we have adequate guidance for the discussion next week, and would hope that other delegations may by then be in a position to express their own governments' views on these points.

4. It seems clear, however, that the Council will have to concern itself with more than guiding principles. Steel indicated in the Council on September 9, for example, that the United Kingdom would be particularly interested in the views of other NATO countries on "safeguards". It was pointed out by Norway, Portugal, and Greece that while they would certainly wish to exchange views upon principles, they were also vitally interested in the means which might be chosen for implementing the principles.⁶⁰ In other words, they were quite ready to accept the idea that controls of German rearmament would be required and guarantee would have to be given. The essential question was "what controls and what guarantees?" If consideration of these questions was to be left to a small group engaged in consultations with the Germans until a final stage when fairly complete agreement had been reached, then the theory that NATO collectively would take the decisions would be seriously compromised.⁶¹

5. We have observed recently in the press indications that the general lines of your proposal (discussed in your telegram No. 607 of September 8) are being taken up, although these references have remained general and have not attributed the idea to any particular source. In the light of the considerations set out above, we suggest that it would be valuable for us to give some indication of Canadian views on these aspects of the problem at the discussion next week. At this relatively early stage we do not believe that these views should be presented as a "plan" but rather as a line of thought which might contribute to a solution and which deserves further exploration. If you agree, you will no doubt wish to send us more precise instructions, but we would imagine that a statement on this subject should be based on the original memorandum for the Minister of July 16, taking full account of the modification (outlined in your telegram No. 607) of which we expect to receive a fuller indication in the new memorandum being sent to us by bag.

6. As you will realize from our views on this subject, as given in previous correspondence, we fully support the modifications that have been introduced since the preparation of the July 16 memorandum. In particular, we agree with the views in paragraph 5 of your telegram No. 607. We might point out that the undertaking suggested in the first sentence of paragraph 6 can very easily be presented as non-discriminatory in that it is a particular application of a general undertaking made by all countries who have acceded to the Charter of the United Nations.

7. It may be possible in the next few days to develop somewhat more detailed thoughts on this subject, but in the meantime, we would be grateful for an early indication of your thinking on our strong recommendation to make our statement in the Council next week as frank and forthcoming as possible.

NATO AND GERMAN REARMAMENT

We have studied with interest the memorandum of September 3 on NATO and German rearmament. It appears to us considerably more realistic than the memorandum of July 16, and we believe that its general points are likely to command a good deal of support. We appreciate the new emphasis on "control" rather than "limitation", which has led us to look beyond the general principles and consider more fully (see below) the practical issues involved in the matter of inspection.

2. We consider it particularly important that the armament control concept has now been linked specifically with the admission of Germany to NATO. We have already argued that such admission would provide by far the most satisfactory answer to the need for rapid action in the present political crisis. To the extent that the armament control concept would facilitate the admission of Germany to NATO, it is certainly desirable; but we still believe that, in itself, this concept would carry with it certain risks for the organization as the West's principal agency for organizing military defence. We do not disagree with the view that there might be restored "a positive purpose to the alliance by obtaining willing German participation in the Atlantic Community, binding the alliance more closely together and providing it with a flexible machinery capable of facilitating future NATO defence planning, whatever direction it might take". We agree that such developments "would increase popular support for NATO rather than the contrary", but we believe that these desirable results (if they can be attained), will follow from the integration of Germany in the Atlantic Community in a manner satisfactory to all concerned, rather than from the acceptance by NATO of a concept which might be in conflict with the organization's primary purposes. In other words, the concept should be regarded as a means of obtaining the admission of Germany to NATO, and the end to be sought is really the effective integration of Germany into the North Atlantic Community.

3. If this end is to be attained, it appears to us that that community will have to become a significantly closer and more coherent entity than it has hitherto been. The armament control idea could undoubtedly contribute to such a development. It should be considered, however, that to the extent that it has this effect, the armament control scheme would have important implications for Canada. If we assume that variant B (paragraphs 12 and 13 of the memorandum of September 3) is ultimately accepted, it will mean that we must define those forces in Canada which fall within its scope. It has been our consistent position, and one publicly stated, that the entire Canadian defence programme, with the exception of Korea, is a part of the NATO programme as a whole. We could scarcely advocate an armament control scheme of the type proposed as an element in the development of a closer and more coherent Atlantic Community, and at the same time withhold from the operation of the scheme all Canadian forces not at present assigned to NATO commanders. Indeed the same problem will arise in more complex form in the United States if the armament control scheme is accepted by that country, and it may be necessary to give immediate consideration to the possibility of replacing the present Canada-United States Regional Planning Group by a corresponding NATO Supreme Command to which at least the majority of forces for the defence of North America could be assigned.

4. It appears to us that if Canada is to suggest this plan, we will have to accept the principle of NATO inspection of at least some elements in the defence programme within Canada. It is not clear what machinery would be established for carrying out such inspections, but we imagine that the armed services of the Standing Group powers would insist on the inspections being made by military authorities, presumably by the Supreme Commanders. (This would make it almost inevitable that some sort of North American Supreme Command be established). On the whole we would consider inspection by the Supreme Commanders, a natural development, as they are already formally responsible for the most significant elements in the military content of the NATO Annual Review. Such an approach would tie in with what is apparently the Dutch view, that the authority of SACEUR should be enhanced as one of the means of controlling a German rearmament programme. (See paragraph 3(e) of telegram No. 107 of September 10th from The Hague).†

5. There is considerable press speculation concerning the possibility of revising the Brussels Treaty so as to include Germany and Italy, and at the same time make provision by that means for the integration of Germany into the Western Defence Programme. Obviously this is a matter to be finally decided among the seven countries concerned, but if it is proposed as an alternative to German admission to NATO, then we believe that it should be discouraged. Such a plan would involve protracted negotiations, at least if it were to define with any precision the military relationship of Germany to NATO. At the same time it would tend to offset, against the goal of incorporating Germany in the broadest sense within an Atlantic Community, an emphasis upon the consolidation of purely European links. Such a consolidation is not in itself undesirable, but if it were put forward as an immediate objective in such a way as to impede or delay the broader and more important goal, then it would surely be a mistake. In order to prevent this, we believe that Canada should be prepared to make every possible concession which could help to strengthen a genuine Atlantic Community. Such concessions, on lines indicated above and in fields other than the military as well, would in reality mean accepting a concept of NATO as having a certain supranational content (if not form) which it does not at present possess.

6. We would hope if possible to receive your preliminary views, and your estimate of the reactions of other departments, prior to the meeting with Eden on Thursday morning. The questions raised above have a bearing on our recommendation (our telegram No. 686 of September 10) that we put forward in the Council, an outline of the position given in your telegram No. 607 of September 8, and the memorandum of September 3.

TELEGRAM 1143

London, September 14, 1954

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

GERMAN REARMAMENT

Following is text of Mr. Eden's first report to Foreign Office on his talks with Adenauer, Begins: Dr. Adenauer began the afternoon meeting with a long and not uncritical summary of German historical developments from 1848 to 1939 to explain without excusing German failure to build up a firm and democratic structure hitherto. This was now the task of the Federal Government. Fortunately, Nazi ideas had for all practical purposes disappeared. Germany was however placed geographically between the East and the West and the division of the country encouraged honest as well as dishonest Germans to look East. The European idea, which had a great appeal to German youth, remained the only certain way to confirm German association with the West and to strengthen German democracy. His own authority, and that of his government, was still strong, but it had suffered from the French Assembly decision, and there were difficulties with all the German political parties, each of which, including the Socialists, had definite nationalist tendencies. Germany's economic prosperity made for stability but even this was not as solid as the outside world thought, and it would not resist a slump as well as the economy of other countries with a stronger capital structure. Our joint European problems should be considered against this background, since the consequences for Europe as well as for Germany would be disastrous if Germany fell within the Soviet orbit either directly or gradually via neutralization.

2. The Chancellor said he would not waste any words on the Brussels six-power conference or the French decision. It was no use now trying to revive the E.D.C., or something like it, although such a community might be possible later on. The entry of Germany into NATO was the right solution. Insofar as this meant a German national army, he was prepared to accept self-imposed limitations and would also be prepared to put this army into an integrated army, if this became possible later. The German goal remained some European organization, and Germany was as anxious as France that the United Kingdom should be associated with it.

3. Any such solution presupposed the end of the occupation régime. He preferred to avoid the phrase "the restoration of sovereignty", since few countries now had absolute sovereignty. If the occupation powers could renounce their occupation rights unilaterally, there would be no need for parliamentary ratification and this should be helpful in France. He agreed of course that the three powers must retain their special position in regard to Berlin and reunification and agreements to replace the forces convention would be needed.

4. The Chancellor attached the greatest importance to maintaining the United Kingdom automatic assistance to the E.D.C. and vice versa, which was not part of the NATO Treaty. He hoped that, as soon as agreement had been reached in principle between all the powers concerned, the Federal Republic could begin preparatory work on building barracks and factories for making only that material which had been allowed under the E.D.C. Treaty. He hoped that Germany could then send specialists etc. to the United Kingdom and the United States for training. There was need for speed as the German personnel concerned were becoming frustrated after such long delays and many were returning to private life.

5. The Chancellor then turned to his ideas of safeguards. One of his main reasons for preferring the NATO solution at this stage was that SHAPE could ensure that all the NATO countries did as much as they should but that no one did more. There was always the danger that France would refuse (he was sure that the other thirteen NATO countries would agree) and this possibility would have to be borne in mind. But he thought that our idea of using and expanding the existing Brussels Treaty Organization should be a great help with the French. Before he had known of this he had been thinking rather of a new grouping within NATO within which he could meet the Prime Minister's suggestion for self-limitation. Such limitations which could be on the same scale as in E.D.C. would cover German effectives and the equipment with which they would be provided. Germany would agree to call up and train forces only within the E.D.C. limits, but such troops must be provided with their initial equipment, without prejudice to later agreements on German equipment and arms production, and the control of all this presumably through NATO. I told the Chancellor that, once agreement had been reached on a German defence contribution, German troops in the line beside our own must of course receive the same equipment. The Chancellor was visibly pleased by this as the Chancellor then turned to the idea of exchanging assurances within a smaller European grouping of NATO countries bound by assurances of automatic aid, and also having means of political consultation among themselves. German military experts thought that Denmark might be added to the six E.D.C. countries and the United Kingdom. The Chancellor would be prepared to consider a joint general staff for these countries in order to meet the general fear of German general staff. All this would of course be part of NATO. In addition the Chancellor would expect the various E.D.C. safeguards for Germany to be reaffirmed, e.g. the three power declaration of May 1952 and the United Kingdom and United States assurances of April last.

6. The Chancellor then said that he now thought that all this could be done much better through our plans of German entry into NATO on the one hand, and the expansion of the Brussels Treaty to include Germany and Italy on the other.

7. I thanked the Chancellor for his picture of the German scene, and said we thought there were two problems before us: First a closer German political association with the west; and second, the German defence contribution. We thought the first even more important than the second. Adenauer (group undecypherable? agreed). I explained our difficulties with Adenauer [who] fully understood about joining any supra-national organization, and explained why we hoped the Brussels Treaty proposal would help to solve our problems. This proposal met two conditions to which the Chancellor had attached importance: Automatic assurances and standing political consultation. We could consider whether Denmark and Norway would also like to join. I thought the position in Italy was also most important and hoped that our proposal would help the Italian Government in their internal difficulties. All three Benelux Governments had welcomed our ideas and authorized me so to inform the Chancellor. They had made certain additional suggestions which we would consider sympathetically, and which seemed in line with the Chancellor's own ideas for providing certain safeguards and assurances to NATO from the individual members of the expanded Brussels group, provided always that the system is a NATO system operated through SACEUR, SHAPE and the NATO machinery. This might help us to get over probable difficulties which would otherwise arise for the Americans.

8. I then discussed the problem of ending the occupation régime. We were not far apart in our general objectives although there were some difficult legal problems which I was confident could be overcome. Apart from Berlin and reunification the forces agreement was important not only to us but for the Pentagon whose attitude to stationing American troops in Europe was now uncertain. The finance question was also serious for us. We agreed that United Kingdom and German officials should discuss this and the question of safeguards more fully after dinner tonight.

9. I then explained our anxieties about the growth of a new isolationism in the United States. The Chancellor said that he shared these anxieties, and he welcomed my intention to bring home the dangers to the French in Paris. I said that we would do our best to persuade the Americans that there was now a serious plan for an early solution of our European problems, and I hoped Adenauer would do the same, e.g. when he saw Mr. Murphy on Tuesday.
